Our Gospel Tent Fund

A NUMBER of our readers, who have been interested in our Gospel Tent enterprise under the leadership of Evangelist Benjamin F. Butts, have sent in their offerings to be applied toward the equipment and support of the big evangelistic tent. Pastor Butts' account of the opening of the work at Grand Rapids, Mich., is most encouraging. Not only was the spacious canvas auditorium crowded, but the local ministers of various denominations showed a warm interest in the services, and took an active part. On October 3 Evangelist Butts wrote: "We will be able to establish a Community Church here. Next Sabbath we will have Communion and the reception of new members in the Gospel Tent. Its location is near the Old Soldiers' Home and service after service we have had these veterans of '61 sitting with shining, uplifted faces as we have given them the Gospel message in sermon and song. Several of them accepted Christ. One man came into the tent one evening and told us he had not been inside of a place of worship in thirty-seven years. Several young men have come out for Christ and given up their bad habits. We thank God for your gift of the Christian Herald Gospel Tent. Our next meeting will be at Caro, Mich."

The tent, which is a strong and commodious structure, of the best United States Army canvas, has a seating capacity of 800. To keep it in full operation and amply supplied with Scriptures and hymnals, as well as to meet the cost of transportation from city to city and state to state, funds are needed. It will be used very larg the poorer districts of good-sized and villages, and also in rural s where there is no regular church ing. In this way, it is believe many thousands of the non-c going population can be reache the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Evangelist Butts has a record successful revival preacher and winner. He has with him e helpers for the tent campaign, inc singers and personal workers. W the prayers of our readers that th campaign may be made a mea blessing to many, and that souls n won to Christ.

The Wicked John Goode

"Jack and Mick can play a trick," he said.

As he spoke the word "Jack" he brought the key in his right hand down on the top of my head with a resounding blow, and as he spoke the word "Mick" the key in his left hand struck my head an even harder blow.

The scalp had broken in two places, and blood streamed down my face.

This paid officer of the law was reforming me!

You know what hate does for a boy. You know what brutality does for a boy. I was no exception. I hated that man from that moment. At times I would have killed him, had I found the chance. He was a big man and strong. At the time I met him he was about sixty years old. I wonder how many boys' heads he busted? While I was there it was a frequent event, and he always prefaced the action with the same remark about "Jack and Mick."

Nor was he the only brute in charge of us. I was struck full in the face and knocked prostrate by a keeper's clenched fist many times. The assistant superintendent, a big, powerful f set the styles in discipline, and as I been prior to his appointment at F a first mate on deep-sea sailing v you can imagine how kind, consi and gentle a fellow he was to pl charge of boys with whom any r were wished for other than har vicious characters.

This man, like the large ma then and now, was a political holder.

I was always a rebel, mind yo ways on the wrong side of every I needed discipline, and that But every day I stayed at Palme chances of my reforming were gr less and less. I possessed and us faculty of causing more trouble i time than any boy I ever knew or tell of. But each time I got "bea and came away bleeding I added a more to my already large quota ciousness. What could you exp not that? I wasn't old enough to r that anger and hate and viciou would get me nowhere.

After two visits to the dungeo punishment cells I did learn to nfractions of rules which meant stairs." It was too terrible! ngeons and all they meant in that chool at Palmer were as terrible cruel as those for hardened s in San Quentin and Sing Sing r palmiest days. Again I know! you imagine the effect of such ent on the minds and morals of boys? Thank God that the boys y are being treated in a some-more humane manner. Thank hat correctional institutions are aking an effort to correct rather crush—to build up rather than down. Thank God for such a as Mother Booth and for such s Thomas Mott Osborne, Dean ey, Canada Blackie, Jack Mur-onald Lowrie, Ed Morrell, Earl ag, and others of the new penol-! A bright era has dawned, and ll got to keep it going!

CHAPTER VI

Which I Am Bound Out

ER I had been at Palmer about year, or possibly a little longer—y body was covered with marks ises where they had beaten me nd blue to reform me and teach at love meant—the great state me out to a German and his wife t Hampton. This man, whose 've forgotten, was the foreman in ender factory. As was then the , I was to remain with him until twenty-one, during which time to care for me and give me a And I, in turn, was to learn his and answer to him in all ways. I went to work in his shop. It longer than I had expected it A long five weeks went by be-decided that I had learned all I d to about the manufacture of iders. I made up my mind to was I to do it? Instantly the answer came. I was at my bench at the time. I dropped what I was doing and went straightaway to the grocer with whom the foreman traded. I told that grocer in a plain, simple manner that my boss had sent me to him to borrow ten dollars until that night. Of course, the merchant was skeptical and refused to let me have the money. Instead of letting it go at that (as most boys would have done), I argued with him until he was finally sorry I hadn't asked him for twenty. He gave me the ten.

I thanked him and left the store. Instead of walking in the direction of the shop where my boss was I went in the opposite direction—down the railroad ties at that—with the ten dollars in my pocket and with the grocer looking at me in open-mouthed amazement. However, he wasn't long in reaching my boss with the story, and they lost no time in getting a horse and buggy. They caught me, of course, and brought me back to town. That night after supper we took a second buggy ride, and the big front doors of the State Primary School at Palmer closed with a bang at my back, and I was again a prisoner.

During the few weeks in which I had been away from the school, the superintendent had gone and a new man had been appointed in his place. Mr. Bradford was a very different sort. He was kind naturally. His being a relative of the then lieutenant governor of the state accounted, no doubt, for a man of his temperament being appointed to the school. During the Civil War he had served as a chaplain of a Massachusetts regiment, I believe.

Very soon Mr. Bradford began to have serious trouble with me, and my record was looked up more thoroughly than ever before. He decided that Palmer was not the sort of place I required, and so he had me transferred to the Home for Incorrigible Boys at Deer Island.

Religious Work in a University

ORGE O. FOSTER, for twenty-five years registrar of the University of Kansas, does not be-n leaving all the work of starting ew students right to the Young n's and Young Men's Christian iations. He does not consider his by any means as completed when d his force of assistants have cor-registered and enrolled the new-s. This fall, as the 2,700 students ered, they were each handed a ttle pamphlet. The title page was except for the words "Character r" ide on the next page were the simple injunctions:

on't break the Home Ties!"

'rite that letter today!"

o to Church next Sunday!"

page three the students read a personal message from Mr. Foster "You are here for an education," d. "Strive to be able to answer ollowing questions in the affirma-when your work is done."

e questions which follow are not al with Mr. Foster, but, as he ins, "they are better than I could re." Here they are:

your education given you sympathy ll good causes and made you espouse it made you public-spirited?

it made you a brother of the weak?

e you learned to make friends and keep you know what it is to be a friend your-you look an honest man or a pure n straight in the eye?

you see anything to love in a little child?

a lonely dog follow you in the street?

you be high-minded and happy in the r drudgeries of life?

you think washing dishes and hoeing ust as compatible with high thinking as playing or golf?

you good for anything to yourself? ou be happy alone?

you look out in the world and see any-except dollars and cents?

you look into a mud-puddle by the way-nd see anything in the puddle but mud?

you look into the sky at night and see ing but stars?

ien on the back page of the pamphlet is quoted an anonymous poem, "If Each Gave Self."

He serves his country best
Who lives pure life, and doeth righteous deed
And walks straight paths, however others stray
And leaves his sons an uttermost bequest—
A stainless record which all men may read.
This is the better way.

No drop but serves the slowly lifting tide,
No dew but has an errand to some flower,
No smallest star but sheds some helpful ray
And man by man each giving to all the rest,
Makes the firm bulwark of the country's power.
There is no better way.

THE Laymen's Missionary Movement officially opened its fall and winter campaign Sunday, October 8, at Washington Court House, Ohio, in the first of a series of county conventions in rural territory to be held during the fall and winter. The missionary leaders are convinced that the rural church needs to have modern methods of successful church work brought within its reach.

Large amounts of money are available in the rural field, and will be released for the extension of Christ's kingdom when the world situation is made known to these people. The wealth of Ohio, especially in the neighborhood of Washington Court House, is immense. The farm land there is so rich that a man seldom works his own farm, and the tenant system is in vogue through that whole territory. It is hoped that such wealth may be turned into the work of missions, through the medium of such conventions as the one just held.

THE Christian Herald has just received from Anna E. Hall of the Garraway Mission at Cape Palmas, Liberia, a grateful letter acknowledging the gift from a reader in West Virginia of a scholarship in the school. The Garraway school is training native Christians for aggressive service. While the missionaries in Rhodesia and Central Africa are fighting famine due to lack of rain, the missionaries in Liberia are feeding people whose crops have been destroyed by torrential downpours. Miss Hall tells of the distribution of two tons of rice sent by the mission board, which relieved distress for a time. The missionaries of the Garraway station have also been able to share breadfruit and other products of the mission farm with those whose crops have been washed away. In spite of afflictions and privations, souls are being saved, and in the week before the writing of this letter a native king had come to the mission to plead for a teacher for his people.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE daily mail of the Prayer League is continuing evidence of faith in the power of prayer. Each week a company of earnest souls is gathered together, each heart is reaching toward the spiritual goal of full entry into the holy place. Some come with eager faces to acknowledge the wonderful blessings of answered prayer. Others come bearing burdens with hands outstretched for help which only a loving Father above may give. Others come burdened in spirit for those near and dear to them whose feet are treading strange paths, while still others bear to the throne of grace the communities in which they live, seeking the blessing of the outpouring of the Spirit in the conversion of precious souls. Many prayers are raised for the triumph of prohibition in the election which is to be held as this issue of the Christian Herald is flying through the mails to its readers. We wish we could give all these letters individual notice, but those that follow seem to stand out most insistently.

Mrs. F. L. D. asks the prayers of the League for her husband, that he may be restored to his ministry and enabled in some measure to pay up debts which desperately harass and press him and his family. The story of Mr. D. is too long to be given in full in the Prayer League column, but it is the old story of the successful minister who, because of the honor and trust in which he is held, is inveigled by designing men into lending his name to a business enterprise about which he knows nothing. In this minister's case, his parishioners and friends lost thousands of dollars in a crooked deal, and the minister himself, after twenty-seven years of successful service, found himself cast out. Now, after seven years, although he has worked hard as a Bible agent and in other ways outside of the pulpit, winter has come on with the family treasury depleted and nothing but poverty and want in sight. Their four children, one girl and three boys, lack clothing and nourishing food and are still laboring under the shadow of the father's blunder. The mother writes that she will try to hold on.

Mrs. C. McG. writes that when the Prayer League was first organized she asked the Lord to assure her that the old Bowery Mission was an accepted place of prayer. Following her prayer, she opened the Bible and found her eyes resting upon the seventh and eighth verses of the fifty-sixth chapter of Isaiah, in which God says, "Mine house shall be called a house of prayer for all people. The Lord God which gathered the outcasts of Israel saith, Yet will I gather others to him." Mrs. McG. felt that it would have been impossible to have gotten a more definite answer to her prayer, because the Bowery Mission is constantly ministering to outcasts and bringing them to the fold of the Father.

J. W. B. asks for light on the question as to whether it is proper to pray for guidance in the settlement of a question in which he and another Christian differ as to the matter of the right. He desires to settle the question in the spirit of the Christ and fears that he may mistake the promptings of the spirit of evil for the guidance of the Spirit of God.

The Mystery of Fame

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

EEN E. REXFORD died October 8. And though he was the author of many very wonderful songs and (we have published a number of almost every notice of his death 'Mr. Rexford is known as the of 'Silver Threads Among the " It was a commonplace little ballad t made Eben E. Rexford famous. ave no doubt that Mr. Rexford some of his work with the hope would live long after he himself ead. (Every writer, almost, has ope.) Some of the work is fine to live! And I have scarcely any that he wrote "Silver Threads the Gold" simply as an experi- simply to please himself; simply e he wanted to write it. And yet it t song, played on barrel-organs, y the thousands, that has made love him—that will make people ber him.

very often that way in this world. t Louis Stevenson wrote "Treasland" for his own pleasure, and it e his most popular book. Lewis ll created "Alice in Wonderland" use a group of children, and it will s keep his name alive in the heart world. Kipling's wife, they say, his wonderful "Recessional" discarded, in the waste-paper t. She took it out carefully and t to a publisher. Now it's the best- n—perhaps the greatest—of any s poetry. I hardly think that ning spent as much time and ht and study over "The Pied of Hamelin" as he did over his ts, and yet many people have his "Pied Piper" who will never that he wrote a sonnet. Pictures artists have painted laughingly in spare hours are the pictures that rever in spite of the huge canvases re hung on the studio wall for the use and admiration of the public.

NCE knew a woman who wrote ories. Her stories were eagerly nt after, for they were well written harming. And yet she wasn't just ied with them.

ome day," she used to tell us, "I'll mething really fine."

ou're always doing good work," variably answered; but she would and say: "It will be better— day."

d then, one afternoon, while we at a little tea party, she came in ngly, happily, and cried out as she us:

've written my big story—my great beautiful story. I'm tired, and sleepy, but I'm glad; for I've done best thing that I have ever hoped o."

ell, she sold the big story—just as sold all of her other work. And it ted the momentary interest that of her stories created—no more. then she wrote another story, and ple liked it just as well. And she a wondered why no one considered to her, big story finer than her other k. For she had meant it to be a terpiece—a real masterpiece.

ND then, several years later, she died suddenly. And the literary ld felt its loss keenly. And one critic said: "Her work was so—even! She never did bad work, or careless work. She never went below a certain standard. She never went above it, either, but the standard was so high . . ."

And the story that was in its creator's mind a masterpiece was included in the phrase, "A good story—up to her standard!"

AND then, one day, one of her friends who conducted a personal department on a magazine showed us a letter. It was a letter from a farmer woman somewhere in the Middle West.

"I think you might like to know," wrote the farmer woman, "about a little experience that I once had with a famous authoress. Maybe you knew her—when she was alive.

"My son and my husband were both killed on the same day in a terrible accident, and I was just about crushed when the news came to me. My heart and soul and body seemed all one empty ache for them. And after the funeral, to take my mind away from terrible thoughts, I sat down and wrote a letter.

"I wrote the letter to her. She was my favorite writer. I wrote it because it was necessary to confide in some one, but I never expected an answer.

"And yet, she did answer! And her letter to me was the first thing that showed me that I could still go on living my life without my husband and my son. She enclosed a little poem in the letter. I want you to read it."

THE authoress was, we discovered, our friend. She had done so many kind little deeds! And, a group of us together, we read the tiny poem that she had sent to the grief-stricken farmer woman, the strange woman that she had never seen. It was brimming over with tenderness and sympathy and love—that little poem; so full of her spirit that we were very silent for a moment after we had finished reading it; and then some one said:

"It is her masterpiece." And we all knew that it was.

SO the story that was worked over and struggled with was spoken of as "up to standard"—no more. But the little poem, written for only one pair of eyes to see—written from the fulness of an understanding heart—was the perfect bit of work.

IT'S like that in this world. The things that we dream of doing greatly are often only average deeds suited to average minds. But the little casual deeds that we do kindly, helpfully, unthinkingly, perhaps, are the deeds that will last.

BE careful of the little deeds you do,
For oftentimes they echo back to you
Across the years.
The tiny note you sent one sorry day,
The coin that helped a beggar on his way;
Ah, always take the time to stop and say
The word that cheers!

Perhaps some little deed may bring you fame,
Perhaps the world will learn to love your name
Because of tears
You dried for others. And when life is through,
Perhaps the little deeds you, thoughtless, do,
Will be a glowing monument to you
For countless years!

Millions for Good Causes

CCORDING to a recent compilation in the New York Times, the people merica faced on October 1 the beginning of many campaigns for money which involve even greater giving than has been known. Sixty million dollars be asked by various Protestant ies for pension systems. Foreign sion Societies in the United States Canada, which last year received vard of $18,000,000, this year seek ,000,000. Congregationalists are ing $2,000,000 to celebrate the ding of the Pilgrims; Lutherans are sing $3,000,000 for the anniversary of Reformation in 1917; the German ormed Church is raising a million the same purpose; and Baptists, thodists and Christians are raising funds expressed in more millions. Various Catholic orders are planning to raise $6,500,000 for educational projects, besides other millions for missionary work. Educational institutions and hospitals are seeking funds for new buildings and endowments. The International Y. M. C. A. and the local associations will ask $15,000,000 for their work, and for various building projects. The only lessening of demand appears to be along the line of church building and general benevolences, where an appropriation of $60,000,000 has been reduced to thirty-five or forty-five million. It is said that the American people give each year $410,000,000 to maintain church work apart from benevolences.

Has your Rubber Footwear a Pedigree?

These are famous trade-marks in the rubber footwear industry. Each one of these marks stands for the product of a great factory—great in reputation as well as size. If your rubber footwear bears one of these brands, it is the descendant of a long line of quality products; it has a worthy "pedigree."

It would require an expert to determine, from appearance alone, the difference in quality between good and poor rubber footwear. The principal guide would be the better shaping—snappier style. And style in rubber footwear—off the foot—might baffle even keen eyes.

Only well-made, high-grade rubber footwear will look well, fit well and wear well. Only by securing a standardized, trademarked, pedigreed quality product such as these brands represent can you distinguish the best from the rest and be sure of wear, fit, style and quality.

Seventy-four years of successful manufacturing and the experience of forty-seven great factories are back of every pair of rubber shoes, overshoes, arctics, boots, etc., produced by the United States Rubber Company, the largest rubber manufacturer in the world.

Rubbers that fit wear twice as long as rubbers that do not fit.

The Reformation Jubilee Programme

FOR several years the Lutheran Church in America has been making extraordinary preparations for the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the Protestant Reformation. The particular event that strikes the keynote of this great celebration took place on October 31, 1517, when Martin Luther nailed the ninety-five theses on the church door at Wittenberg. The American Church proposes to devote a whole year, beginning with the coming 29th of October, to a commemoration of this greatest of modern religious events. On October 29, mass meetings will be held in Philadelphia, New York, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul, Minneapolis, at which speakers of national eminence will present the principles that underlie the coming celebration and connect them in their relations to the fundamental principles of our American Constitution. The meeting in Philadelphia will be held in the Metropolitan Opera House.

The celebration in the United States is under the charge of a general Joint Committee, appointed by the three general bodies of the Lutheran Church in North America, namely, the Goneral Synod, General Council, and United Synod South, and participated in by a number of Western Lutheran Synods. The personnel of the executive portion of the Joint Committee is as follows: Rev. T. E. Schmauk, D.D., LL.D., of the Mt. Airy Theological Seminary, Chairman; President John A. Morehead of Roanoke College, Salem, Va., Secretary; John L. Zimmerman, attorney at Springfield, Ohio, Treasurer; Prof. V. G. A. Tressler, Ph.D., Wittenberg Seminary, Springfield, Ohio; Rev. M. G. G. Scherer, D.D., Charleston, S. C.; Rev. J. A. Singmaster, D.D., Gettysburg Seminary, Gettysburg, Pa.; Prof. G. A. Andreen, Ph.D., Augustana Seminary, Rock Island, Ill.; Rev. F. Richter, D.D., Clinton, Iowa; Prof. R. C. H. Lenski, Capital University, Columbus, Ohio; Rev. L. Harrisville, Chicago, Ill.; Prof. N. P. Lang, Dana College, Blair, Neb.; Prof. Geo. Sverdrup, Augsburg Seminary, Minneapolis; Mr. E. Clarence Miller, Philadelphia, Pa., Chairman of the Committee on finance; Rev. S. W. Herman, Harrisburg, Pa., Chairman of a sub-committee on programs; Rev. N. R. Melhorn, D.D., Reading, Pa., Chairman of a sub-committee on literature and publicity; Rev. J. Zimmerman, D.D., LL.D., Syracuse, N. Y., Chairman of a sub-committee on medals; Rev. L. D. Reed, D.D., Mt. Airy Seminary, Chairman of a sub-committee on music.

The Committee has been arranging with the daily, weekly and monthly press and has a literary force at work by means of which the whole Reformation movement will be characterized for American readers. It has established sub-organizations in all our larger centers, New York, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Charleston, Chicago, Erie, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Wheeling, York, Rochester, Cleveland, Columbus, Toledo, Los Angeles, Omaha, Kansas City, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, New York, and other places, which will cooperate with the Joint Committee in all the general features of the great celebration. That the celebration will be on a large scale is evident from the size of the membership of nearly 3,000,000. It may not be generally known that the Lutheran Church is the largest Protestant body in the world, numbering 76,000,000, or as large as all other Protestant churches combined.

In addition to the Lutherans a large number of other Protestant denominations have signified their desire to cooperate in the celebration of the great event which liberated the conscience of the individual Christian from general ecclesiastical authority and gave every man the right and the responsibility to decide for himself in regard to the supreme matters of his own faith, and his own civic activities.

The Monthly Offering Clubs

READERS of the Christian Herald who wish to make every dollar of their charitable gifts count, whether they give in small or large sums and to whatever cause, were urged in our last issue to consider the principle of giving as laid down in the Old and New Testaments. This fundamental principle is regularity; over and over again; being not weary in well-doing. In line with this we have established ten monthly offering clubs as follows:

No. 1. For donors of fifty cents monthly;
No. 2. For donors of one dollar monthly;
No. 3. For donors of two dollars monthly;
No. 4. For donors of three dollars monthly;
No. 5. For donors of five dollars monthly;
No. 6. For donors of ten dollars monthly;
No. 7. For donors of twenty dollars monthly;
No. 8. For donors of twenty-five dollars monthly;
No. 9. For donors of fifty dollars monthly;
No. 10. For donors of some amount monthly determined by circumstances each month.

Primarily these clubs were instituted for the assistance of those who wish to give as much as possible to the relief of the innocent victims of the war in Europe. But they need not be confined by any means to that one, at present, supreme charity. We shall be most glad to apportion every gift according to the wish of the donor, whether to definite parts of the European field, or partly there and partly to one or more other causes in this country or abroad. The Bowery Mission will need your help this winter, and some may wish to make a gift each month to that splendid work. Our splendid Chinese orphans' work is right now greatly in need of your help.

The point is to determine, if possible, to make a regular offering for charitable purposes, and to enroll in one or another of these clubs for that purpose. But by no means must any reader suppose that he or she cannot give effectively outside of this arrangement. We believe the regular system to be the most effective, but where individuals simply cannot undertake to give regularly month after month a specified amount or, for that matter, any amount, let all such individuals give as they are able. We would say nothing to discourage those who prefer to give only now and then as circumstances determine.

At convenient periods the standing of the clubs will be published in full in the Christian Herald. In order to enroll and to have your gifts in future recorded in one of these clubs, please address the Treasurer of the Monthly Offering Club, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Is Your Watch a Gay Deceiver?

Does your watch mock your intelligence with constant inaccuracies?

If it does, it's safe to say you don't feel any attachment for your watch. An inaccurate watch is like an inefficient employee who is habitually late, or always making plausible excuses for work not done.

If you really want a watch that keeps accurate time, tell your jeweler so. Observe his interest.

When a man comes along who has grasped the fact that if he wants a fine, durable watch he must pay the price of a suit of clothes to get it, the jeweler will go to any length to satisfy him, and will cheerfully give much of his time to seeing that the purchaser has his watch properly adjusted to his personal requirements and that it keeps accurate time.

When you begin to talk accuracy to a jeweler, he begins to talk Hamilton Watch to you.

When you consult your watch, do you have to guess where the minute hand belongs? Does your watch mock your intelligence with constant inaccuracies?

If, before you see your jeweler, you want a broader familiarity with what makes a fine watch

Same HUDSON SUPER-SIX Again Breaks Ocean-to Ocean Record

On Return Trip Across America It Beats Best Previous Time and Establishes World's Endurance Record

The Same Hudson Super-Six Touring Car which ran from San Francisco to New York in 5 days, 3 hours and 31 minutes, started back from New York on its arrival there and again made the transcontinental trip in shorter time than any other car ever made it.

Last spring the wonder record for the one-way trip made by a famous eight was 2⅓ days longer than the time required by the Super-Six.

No other automobile ever made the round-trip against time. Yet in both the going and return trips the Hudson Super-Six lowered the best previous one-way record.

In a little more than 10 days the Super-Six covered 6,952 miles.

Counting all stops, and slowing down to the speed restrictions of 350 cities, towns and villages each way, the average time from San Francisco to New York and back to San Francisco was almost 700 miles a day.

In the last leg of the return trip, between Elko, Nevada, and San Francisco, heavy mountain rains were encountered. In the going trip that distance was covered in 20½ hours. On account of the rain and mud, 35 hours were required on the return. Under similar road conditions as were met in the going trip the return would have been under 5 days.

Hudson Holds Every Worth While Record

There are no important world's records which refer to a stock car that the Hudson Super-Six hasn't won. The best former records are too easy for the Super-Six. The events are too easily won. For instance, in the 24-hour record, 1819 miles, it exceeded the best former record by 52%.

And the Super-Six made the best time in the world's greatest hill-climb up Pike's Peak. The best time for 100 miles. The greatest distance covered in one hour and the fastest time for a stock chassis at the rate of 102½ miles an hour.

Such Endurance Is Convincing

Here we prove again that the Hudson Super-Six has more endurance than we have ever claimed for it.

What can be more convincing than that round-trip across the continent made with a Hudson Super-Six light-weight 7-passenger phaeton? Previous records were made with roadsters and stripped cars, but the Hudson at all times carried three, and sometimes four, passengers, and with its baggage weighed in excess of 5,000 pounds.

No Engineer Hopes to Excel It

Remember that the Super-Six is a Hudson invention controlled by Hudson patents.

A hundred cars have motors of like cylinder capacity. Many cars have more cylinders. But in the Super-Six vibration has been reduced to almost nothing. That adds 80% to efficiency.

The Super-Six is not one of the passing sensations. Ours is not one of those claims to motor supremacy which yields in a year or two to another. Mark what these records mean. There is plenty of evidence now to convince you that it cannot be superseded.

Save $175 Now

For many reasons, now is the time to get a Hudson Super-Six.

In the first place you can get delivery now. Last summer thousands had to wait, and thousands must wait next spring.

Then by buying now you can save $175. The price will be advanced December 1. The models will not be changed. You get the same Super-Six motor, the same wonderful chassis, and the same beautiful body. Your car you get now will be identical with those we shall sell after December 1, except for some minor details.

Why Christianity Is the Hope o ur Country

Christian Endeavor Topic (Home Mi ona Meeting). Ps. 9 : 1–20.

WE often hear the children in ou hor referred to as the hope of our nt The reference is not far wrong. The e hope of the country if they are guided ght but guided wrongly, who shall dec e menace of their future? There is o measure of safe guidance, and tha s measure of Jesus, of the Christ. ly Christianity do we find the perfect g de young feet or for old. Christianity not righteousness, and the nation that is r teo has a hope that is eternal. Christian ba impurity, which damns a nation in l inn life, and it bans injustice, which ca mal government a festering sore. Chri an creates in a nation a refuge for the op sse a haven for those who are in trouble. hri tianity makes men brothers, lifts w n her rightful place as the equal and c ork of man, frees childhood from expl tio and all people from injustice, and make now to mankind the Father who so loved t wor that he sent his only begotten Son to ve from itself. Take away Christiani an there is no other force which will preve gree and lust of power and pride of pla fro running riot.

Why Join the Church?

Epworth League Topic. Eph. 3 : 8

THE church is the body of Christ, nde by him, and made up of all th wh come to God, through faith in him. yo have accepted Christ as your Savio yo belong in the church. Now it happe that through causes which it is impossible trac here, the visible body of Christ is one o in common hope. It is divided into tw grea divisions, and these into sects almost in mer able. Therefore the question is not, Shal I join the church?" but, "Being by m faith a member of the church, with which th several companies shall I join my e t make Christ known to other men as s l a I?" It was to his church that Chri om mitted the task of telling the world hi salvation. There is much advantage in gan ization, there is strength in numbers; ere fore each Christian can accomplish muc more for Christ by working in company wit the Christians than he can hope to acc plish by working alone.

Persons who claim to love Christ an o be his and to wish to serve him sometime raw back from membership in any of the urch organizations of today because of imperf ions in the church. They say that amo the jangle of conflicting creeds they fail to cern the true note of faith; that church m bers profess and are not, and promise and not, that services follow an ancient model, a that much of the ritual is meaningless. hey charge church members with unworthy ing and shy at the unction of some whos ives the Gospel has touched but lightly. B hey are like a man looking through an unf sed field-glass, or seeing only the shadow f a summer day. The church is imperfe because it is as much human as it is ine Its very imperfections should draw to the really earnest child of God, for a conse ted heart seeks worthy service, and the ch h of today offers opportunity for improv ent within itself and the best availa le o ing for service to acknowledged sinners. ith all its imperfections the church is st the one most effective instrument of Ch ian work. Join it, some part of it, by all ns perhaps you may make it less imperfect you can be sure that it will help you nea to God and lead you closer to your Saviou

Questions and Answers

H. H., Mount Morris. I noticed in a recent number of the Christian Herald an editorial on "The Problem of the Pew." Permit me to give you an idea that I have not, as yet, seen in print. We have a bright little college town with a population of 1,200. For many years we have had as fine a brass band as can be found outside of the large cities. It has long been the custom of the band to give a free open-air concert every Saturday night during the summertime, and for that purpose a band stand was erected in the most public place on the principal street of our town. You ought to see the crowds! The people come for miles around in autos, buggies and carriages until our main street is a perfect jam. Some one remarked that people ought to turn out that way to church. The thought acted upon my brain as a match to kindlings. I wrote an article on the subject, which was printed in our local paper. What do you think of the Church plus the Brass Band?

he very suggestion may startle some folks w associate brass bands with circuses, s et parades and the like. Yet, from the e iest times, vocal and instrumental music h been identified with worship. In the g en age of the Hebrews, the temple was the g test school of music the world had ever kwn. David's elaborate preparations for t temple included a choir of 4,000, who we taught to lead the service of praise and tnksgiving by voice and instrument (Chron. 23 : 5). Famous musicians were csen as leaders, and there were twenty-four c rses of skilled singers and players. Many i ruments were used, including harps, c bals, timbrels, psalteries, wind instruments various kinds, trumpets, lyres, flutes, t ets, pipes, and so forth. We have no a quate data as to the character of the sacred sic of those days, but what we do know l orically shows that there were songs suited t lmost every occasion on which instrumental sic could be made to serve in worship. In t primitive Christian Church the musical t of the service was very simple. The use nstruments was discouraged, and it was not il the thirteenth century that organs re introduced. Now they are in universal , and supplemented in many cases with er instruments. In a very considerable portion of the great Protestant churches, musical part of the service has become inctive and ornate, and it is unquestionly a great attraction. That good music, l rendered, is a magnet to many, cannot be estioned. It is possible, however, to overdo matter to such an extent that the musical gram is out of all proportion to the rest of service, so that it becomes what is populy known as a "sacred music concert." r Illinois reader might fill his church by ng a brass band, but there would be a likeood of lowering the spiritual tone of the vice, and possibly offending many good ristian people. In the great Hebrew choirs, the performers were consecrated, and in own great Gospel gatherings the same care observed in choosing for the instrumental l choir work men and women who are in ritual sympathy with the work of the urch and no other. The Christian Herald uld be glad to have the views of its readers this question, and incidentally of any stor who may have been considering such innovation in connection with his own urch services.

Mrs. E. S. S., New Philadelphia, O. In ur letter you state that you are still doubtful to the forgiveness which you crave. You mit that Christ came to save sinners and t all he asks is that sinners come to him for giveness. Christ's word as to sinners, as ealed in the Gospel, shows conclusively that sinners—a Magdalen, a thief on the cross, cowardly Peter, a doubting Thomas—all d any of them who have wanted a Saviour, nd one willing and anxious to help. All t is required is the desire for help, and it freely and fully granted. Only the sick ed a physician, and the Great Physician ing yours for the asking, what more do you ed? Do not allow any morbid thought to disturb you. Any one who is troubled in mind about the sin against the Holy Ghost, may be sure that he is wrong in his conclusions, for if he had, the withdrawal of the restraining power of the Holy Spirit would have left him absolutely indifferent and he would not care whether he had sinned against the Spirit or not. The very fact of his conscience troubling him is evidence that the Spirit has not been withdrawn, but is still pleading with him.

Anon, Jericho, N. Y. 1. How should one spend the Sabbath? 2. Is a person justified in taking a part of the day for pleasure such as auto riding, boating or fishing, if that person, on account of business, is prevented from participating in such pleasure during the week? 3. Are the moving pictures on Sunday the means of keeping people away from saloons? If so, do they do good or harm?

1. One should spend Sunday to the glory of God. That implies attendance on divine worship, visiting the sick and afflicted, doing acts of kindness and charity. One should also rest on Sunday, and in reflection and quietude, gain respite from labor. 2 and 3. Keeping apart from the world means also keeping away from the things with which the world amuses itself on its playday. There are many things which, though well enough and harmless in the ordinary sense, become of doubtful expediency, if by their use a weaker brother is offended.

A. B. C. Please explain (1) II Sam. 19 : 10; (2) Rev. 22 : 20; (3) II Cor. 1 : 11.

1. The kingdom at the times referred to in II Sam. 19 : 10 was completely disorganized. There were three distinct parties clamoring for power—the royalists, the adherents of Absalom, and those who were indifferent to David. Under such circumstances, the king was wise in not hastening back as a conqueror to reascend his throne. A reelection was necessary, and the king remained on the other side of the Jordan awaiting the summons to return. When such invitation was forthcoming but was not joined in by Judah, David was disappointed by his own tribe's lukewarmness and dispatched the two high priests to rouse the men of Judah to take a prominent interest in his cause. This was the act of a skilful politician, but was fraught with danger, inasmuch as the preference given to Judah occasioned outbursts of jealousy among the other tribes. 2. The last words of Revelation have presented difficulties to many scholars. Without going into these, we content ourselves in pointing out that the structure of this verse resembles that of verse 17, in that it contains an exchange of sentiment between the Lord and the believer. Jesus here himself speaks first, testifying to that great truth of his coming, which has been the main theme of the book. "The Coming of Christ," says one distinguished commentator, "has been the source of the Church's hope, the spring of her joy throughout all her troubles. When she hears that it is at hand, what can she do but lift up her head and cry 'Come!'" 3. The apostle is here mindful of the dangers through which he passed, notably those that befell him in Asia, those at Ephesus (Acts 19 : 24) and the complication of dangers alluded to in Acts 20 : 19. He was so weighed down by these troubles that he had even despaired of his life; but he is mindful that his hearers were "helping together" on his behalf by their supplications and that, through this intercession, many others had been influenced to do likewise.

M. J. S. N. O. Please explain Isaiah 66 : 15-17.

If you will compare Isa. 65 : 3, 4, you will see that the prophet here is warning against and foretelling the fate of those who persist in idolatrous customs. There were those who still continued to sacrifice in gardens and burned incense on altars of bricks although God had commanded altars of unhewn stones (Ex. 20 : 25). There were those "which remain among the graves," i. e., for the purpose of necromancy, as if to hold converse with the dead, which eat swine's flesh and legally unclean things (Lev. 11 : 29) in idolatrous sacrifices. The people that do these things God does not want, neither does he want the Pharisee, with his self-righteous purification and formalities.

In these days of overchurched towns and villages, it is quite a change to have a letter from a young and thriving town, which is churchless and needs a minister. E. D. C., a lady in Harriman, Ore., writes that since the coming of the railroad "quite a town has sprung up and we are perplexed about church matters, as we have so many denominations represented. We would like to have an undenominational church and have a minister come and help us, who is filled with a desire to be of service to the people and to advance God's Kingdom." Here is an opportunity for the founding of a good interdenominational or union church, and the Christian Herald will be glad to forward any applications to the proper parties.

Reader, Olean, N. Y. The device you mention is one which lends itself to divination, or looking into the future. There are special warnings in the Scriptures against sorcerers, necromancers and diviners, as you may remember. (See Jer. 29 : 8 and other passages.) On general principles, any pastime which is doubtful should be left alone.

A reader in Greenup, Ill., sends this novel suggestion, which may prove serviceable in an emergency, to those whose hearing has been impaired: "A friend who is deaf made me acquainted with a very simple aid to hearing, which I wish to pass on to others. It is nothing more than a mailing-tube. Any kind of paper can be used, however, by simply rolling it into a tube and speaking into the end, letting the other rest against the ear of the deaf person. I am about as deaf as they ever get, and have spent hundreds of dollars with specialists, but this simple roll of paper beats them all. Even a daily newspaper can be used."

Mrs. M. P. M., New Underwood, S. D. Why could not the friends of Jesus know it was he when they saw him after his resurrection?

The language of Luke 24 : 39 is clear and explicit. The resurrection body proved that Jesus was "the Son of God with power," in taking to himself the same identical body which had been crucified and laid in the grave, and yet which had been glorified "by some such inscrutable change as took place at the transfiguration." The very fact attests him as the Master of life and death and as divine. That the disciples did not readily recognize the risen Lord was probably because "he would conceal only to reveal more fully," says a commentator. Immediate recognition would have filled them with a tumult of joy, fear and doubt. Natural causes probably aided in preventing recognition. A quiet, dignified traveler such as he appeared to be would not be readily recognized as the one who so lately languished in death on the cross.

Isolated, Hardman, Ore. Please explain what Paul's vow was—the one referred to in Acts 21 : 27.

The vow taken by Paul was probably the Nazarite vow, the taking of which involved leading an ascetic life for a certain time, usually for thirty days.

Mrs. H. S., Watertown, Conn. What becomes of the consecrated bread and wine remaining after the communion service?

There is no uniform custom in regard to the disposition of the elements remaining after a congregation has celebrated the communion. In the Episcopal Church the ritual provides that any consecrated bread and wine remaining after communion shall not be carried out of the church, but shall be consumed immediately by the minister and other communicants, who shall reverently eat and drink the same. This custom is not, however, followed uniformly in Episcopal churches, and we have been unable to find any ruling on the subject in any other church. Customs vary throughout the country, both in the Episcopal Church and elsewhere. In some churches the wine is poured back into the general supply from which it came. In others it is poured out on the ground. In some churches the bread remaining is burned. In others, it is scattered on the church yard as an act of mercy to the birds.

Reader, Oakland, Calif. 1. "Jesus" (Iēsous) is the Greek form of a Hebrew name, the full original form of which is "Jehoshua" (Num. 13 : 16), and which by contraction become "Joshua" or "Jeshua." This, transferred into Greek, and taking the termination characteristic of that language, assumed the form of "Jesus." "Jeshua" (or "Yeshuah") means "deliverance." The divine selection of the name is indicated in Matt. 1 : 21—"He shall save his people from their sins." 2. The representations you mention were not only unscholarly but absolutely erroneous.

Reader, Quincy, Mich. We note your comments on the uncertain tone of many pulpits. The fault really lies in the loose teaching in some of our theological seminaries, which gives a most unstable foundation for any student who is to follow an active ministerial career. The result is seen in the character of the preaching and pastoral work. In a certain proportion of cases the foundation of loose beliefs is laid which, unless light comes with experience in the ministry, is liable to wreck what might otherwise have been a useful career of spiritual service. We can conceive of nothing more disappointing to a congregation which has been making real progress in the spiritual life under the teachings of some faithful servant of God, than to find itself compelled to listen to a minister who is not well grounded in the essentials of the faith, who takes occasion to discredit the Bible, and whose whole ministry has a tendency to wreck the faith of the people under his charge. Perhaps a good deal of the preaching of this class is the outcome of sheer intellectual vanity, a desire to show superior knowledge.

Mrs. O. C. K., Pleasanton, Kan. The Evangelical Alliance of the United States was founded in 1867. We do not know whether the denomination you refer to was included in the original organization.

R. G., Manchester, Conn. Candlemas Day is February 2.

A Reader in Washington, D. C., writes us that John Wesley's sermon on "The Sin of Slander" is read yearly in one of the Protestant Churches. "Reader" observes that there is "a growing tendency to slander." It would be an excellent thing if the people who are prone to talk harshly and depreciatingly of others, and who give a ready ear and a loose tongue to the spread of evil reports, would keep before them constantly the fine old Bible verse: "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord" (Prov. 12 : 22), and then to set a watch over their mouth and keep the door of their lips. The meanest thief in the world is one who steals another person's reputation. Slander is an insidious sin which, from small and seemingly harmless beginnings, grows to be a dominant passion that spoils not only the life of the slanderer but scatters its venom around in a wide circle, poisoning other lives and causing undeserved suffering to many innocent souls. Slander, on the lips of one who professes to be a Christian, is an anomaly. We should believe no evil report, and even where it is proved we should be slow to censure, slower still to repeat, and slowest of all to condemn.

E. L. L., Allentown, Pa. We must reiterate that we cannot discuss the question of secret societies in the Mail-Bag. The question is decidedly controversial, and, besides, is one on which the very best of authorities differ. You have given the matter considerable thought, as is evidenced by your letter and citation of Biblical passages, pro and con. No one can possibly help you but your own conscience as guided by prayerful obedience to the Bible and its teachings.

Mrs. A. H., Pedricktown, N. J. Does the fourth chapter of Hebrews mean that we are worshiping on the wrong day and that it ought to be the seventh day instead of the first day of the week?

The word day is not to be taken as an allusion to the Sabbath (the Jews had that long since), nor is it, as the author goes on to say, the "rest of Canaan." To strengthen the statement that it is only believers who enter into God's rest, he quotes again the ninety-fifth Psalm. It was unbelief that excluded the Hebrews from God's rest, and so it is faith that brings to us the appropriate means of producing peace and blessedness, and which is in itself obedience to God's command. Your second question will be answered by mail.

Mrs. E. W. H., Bridgewater, Va. Why, when David numbered the people (I Chron. 21), did the pestilence destroy seventy thousand of the Israelites for David's sin, when they had done no wrong?

In the act of taking the census of a people, there is not only no evil but much utility. But numbering Israel, that people which was to become as the stars for multitude—implying a distrust of the divine promise—was a sin. This sin in David consisted in the census being taken either to gratify his pride, that he might ascertain the number of warriors he could muster for some meditated plan of conquest, or, perhaps more likely still, to institute a regular and permanent system of taxation which he deemed necessary to provide an adequate establishment for the monarchy, but which was regarded as a tyrannical and oppressive exaction, and an infringement on the liberty of the people—a departure from ancient usage unbecoming a tribe of Israel. Why the people were punished for David's sin we cannot say, any more than we can say now why the people of Europe are being punished for the machinations of their rulers and governments. The ways of the Lord are past finding out, and we shall not fully understand till all shall be revealed to us in his good time.

MR. OTIS E. GLIDDEN, the famous gelatine expert, has perfected a new dessert. For 17 years the finest jelly desserts have been of his creation. He has traveled the world to find ways to improve them.

Now he offers his supreme dessert—in quality and flavor surpassing anything you know.

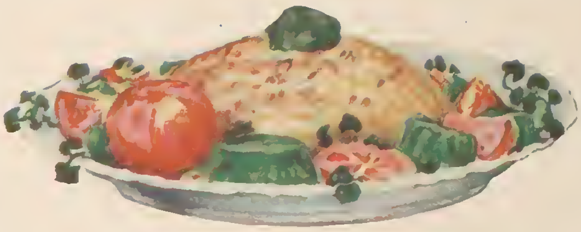
Behind him are men who have long produced a rare-grade gelatine. That grade, and that alone, will be used in Jiffy-Jell. And they have built at Waukesha, for Jiffy-Jell only, a white enameled kitchen—the model food plant of America.

True Fruit Flavors

All flavors for Jiffy-Jell are made from the fruit itself. They are made by concentrating the fresh fruit juice. No artificial flavors are employed.

So Jiffy-Jell, when the flavor is added, tastes like the fruit itself. Yet the flavor isn't bulky. It doesn't make Jiffy-Jell soft. The fruit juice is reduced to an essence.

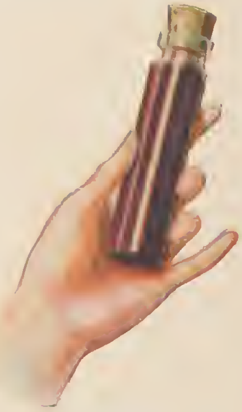
You have never tasted flavors like these—rich, natural and zestful—in a gelatine dessert.



Lime Jiffy-Jell Used as a Garnish

In Separate Vials

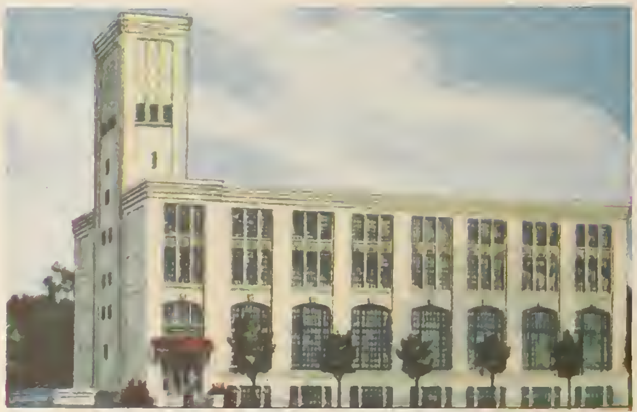
Each flavor comes in a separate vial, kept fresh until you use it.



The gelatine powder comes sweetened and flavored, ready for instant use. Simply dissolve in boiling water. These desserts can be made in a jiffy.

But the flavor comes in a vial. It cannot grow old—cannot lose its delights.

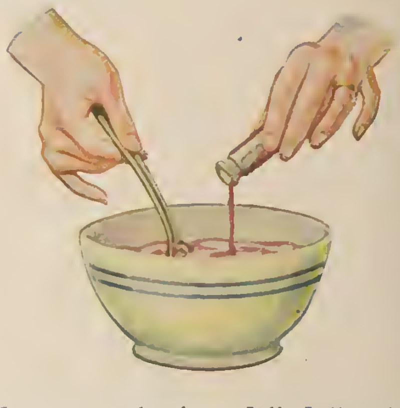
You add the flavor when dessert has partly cooled. So the boiling water doesn't kill it. That's another reason why Jiffy-Jell tastes like fresh fruit itself.



HOME OF JIFFY-JELL, WAUKESHA, WIS.

Fifty Quick Desserts

Jiffy-Jell comes in six flavors. And each can be served in many ways. With fruit, with nuts, with chocolate sauce, with whipped cream or without—any way you like.



You can make from Jiffy-Jell at least fifty desserts, each with its own attractions. Each is a quick dessert, delightful and economical. They are the finest desserts in the world.

Six Dishes Free

One package makes six or eight dishes. We ask you to serve them tomorrow as our treat.

Questions and Answers

M. A. L., Greeley, Colo. Are modern scholars generally agreed that Deuteronomy was not written by Moses, but was probably written in the time of King Josiah? I heard it recently stated that none of the leading scholars of today believe that Moses wrote the book.

Conservative scholarship regards Deuteronomy as forming an integral part of the Pentateuch, which is throughout to be ascribed to Moses. There has been a great deal of controversy and theorizing on the subject, however, in which little regard has been given to the statement in chapter 31 which indicates Moses as the author of the previous contents and also of the Song (chapter 32) and the blessings (chapter 33). All that can be asserted with any degree of positiveness as to any other authorship is in relation to the concluding chapter, in which the account of the death of Moses was written by another hand. Some eminent scholars have held that that final chapter originally formed the first part, or preface, of the book of Joshua.

J. R. H., Alliance, Ohio. Evangelist Sunday, it is understood, is now arranging to open a Gospel campaign in New York City next year. The date of opening and the duration are not yet determined, but it will probably last several months. We are not informed as to his plans after closing in New York. Address him at Scranton, Pa.

H. B., New York. The rule is plain that where the age of twelve is reached and passed the full fare is to be paid. We know it is a temptation to many people to evade the rule, but such an attitude will not stand the test of conscience.

W. H. W. J., Portsmouth, Ohio. The passage in Eccles. 3 : 7, which is probably what you have in mind, is a proverb which means that there are times when silence is the better part of wisdom. This is not to be construed, however, as meaning holding back the truth, if by so doing a wrong or lying impression is given, but that in a time of grave events, or of threatened disaster, the prudent or spiritually wise, "instead of agitating against irremediable evils, will patiently wait for God's plans to work out deliverance," recognizing that protest or interference would be unavailing.

Reader, Pine Plains, N. Y. There is nothing that will more quickly lower the spiritual power and influence of a church than for its members to lift the bars and give a doubtful example to the younger people of the church. If we profess to believe that the body is the temple of the Holy Spirit, and yet take no thought to keep it free from things that are the reverse of spiritual, then we need look for little respect from those who were accustomed to trust us and to follow our example. We ought rather to strive in all things to make our walk, conversation and actions conform to the pattern of the Master we profess to serve. Let us remember that our influence, be it slight or great, may be the means of determining the eternal welfare of others. For this, if for no other reason, let us be careful to do nothing that will bring even the shadow of reproach upon the church. We agree with you that it is sometimes a sore vexation to find that a church, of which we are earnest members, may be given over to card parties, dancing and other worldly pleasures and indulgences. Such a church, being neither cold nor hot, cannot make progress unless its eyes are opened and it begins to see the wickedness of its course and returns to its allegiance and its first love.

Mrs. M. O. B., Eureka Springs, Ark., gives this experience of the comparative value of the Old Testament in family worship. "Our parents had eight children, six daughters and two sons. We had family worship twice a day, morning and evening, with simple, earnest prayer and Bible reading. Our father impressed it upon us that the Bible was the Word of God. We began our reading at Genesis and at Matthew, and we didn't skip any chapter, and when we were through the Bible we began over again. In that way we received a good Bible knowledge and a rich spiritual blessing that goes with us through life. When we read the New Testament, we can understand it so much better when we have read and studied the Old for so many things in the Old Testament were only a shadow of things to come. I love to read the Old Testament; it is like the root to the tree."

H. O. F., Floyd County, Iowa. Please explain Mal. 4 : 5–6.

1. The prophetical Scriptures have a figurative and poetical character. One who would do for his time a work similar to that which was done by Elijah for his age, would in Scripture be called an Elijah. Moreover, we have Christ's own intimation that John the Baptist fulfilled this promise. "If ye will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come" (Matt. 11 : 14). 2. "The great and dreadful day of the Lord." The words before "dreadful day" show that John cannot be exclusively meant, for he came before the day of Christ's coming in grace, not before his coming in terror, of which last the destruction of Jerusalem was the beginning, to be continued and concluded at the end of the world. 3. "Lest I smite the earth with a curse." The threat in these words is, says a well-known commentary, "that if this restoration were not effected, Messiah's coming would prove a curse to the earth, not a blessing." It proved so to guilty Jerusalem and the land of Judea, which rejected Messiah at his first advent. It will prove so to the disobedient at his second advent.

Reader, Lumber City, Ga. Your letter interests us. We think it would be a good thing for you to resolve, with God's help and your own prayerful effort, to put aside all the thoughts of what may have been done about you or said about you, and go right ahead as though it had never happened. We have learned in a long experience in life that there are many things that arise to vex us which are not really worth vexing about. Of course, it is probably not in human nature to ignore them altogether; yet we feel that we would be happier if we could do so. When Christian (the pilgrim in Bunyan's book) was going through the Valley of Humiliation, all kinds of leering, sneering, noisy monsters and hideous shapes came up to hinder his path; but he had the Christian armor on and the sword of the Spirit in his hand, and not one of the venomous shapes could touch him. It would be well for you to get into personal touch with some one engaged in Christian work and who has had a longer experience in the Christian life. Such a person would be wonderfully helpful to one of your temperament and position, and we believe that you would become greatly attached to the work. We have known many cases in which such a connection absolutely dispelled gloomy thoughts and gave new meaning and purpose to the life of the individual.

Heralds of Winter

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE haystacks were gold in the sun of the autumn,
The sky overhead was as blue as the sea;
And every white cloud that swam light on its surface
Was light as a ship bringing day-dreams to me.

And then, of a sudden, the sky clouded over,
The air of the autumn grew bitter and chill;
And winter came roaring (must winter come always?)
O'er hay field and forest, o'er valley and hill.

The haystacks were white, dully white, in the winter,
The sky was as gray as the ghost of a sigh;
And yet, as I looked toward the arch of the heavens,
My clouds, sweet with day-dreams, crept smilingly by.

Dr. W. E. M., Paradise, Calif., commenting on Frank Carpenter's wonderfully interesting Arctic letters, has this to say about his personal experience in gardening in Alaska:

"From your article in The Christian Herald of September 15, 'Uncle Sam, Arctic Farmer,' I received my first intimation that the United States had established an experiment farm at Rampart, Alaska. In the spring of 1898, on a hill lying a little to the south of Rampart City proper, I, with the help om men with me, cleared the brush and nip from three lots I had bought the fall fore and planted them with garden seeds ch had taken to Alaska with me in the fall 897. Two of the lots we planted, in the ap over way, to lettuce, onions, cabbage, bee carrots, radishes, peas, beans, etc.; the ot r lo we sowed broadcast with flat turni an rutabaga seed. Everything grew exce ngl well. The soil is a rich, sandy loam, an afte the moss had been burned off the fros wen out of the ground very rapidly. We f she planting the fifth of June; within a wee ron the time seeds were put in the ground t ha sprouted vigorously. Three weeks fr th time of sowing radish seed, they were fu developed. On the first day of Augus reen peas were ready for eating, and I hav eve seen finer or better-filled pods tha wer these. The cabbage did excellently w th flat turnips and rutabaga grew to a normous size, some of the rutabaga w hin 17½ pounds each. This is the first rde ever planted in that part of Alaska. ad cellar under the house in which we kep hes vegetables fresh and good all winter, a they became a very important part of our enu where heretofore dry beans and bac ha been the principal part of our diet."

A. J. K., Philadelphia, Pa. Both qu ion are controversial, and to discuss them w d b resultless. No one has a right to dog atiz concerning the mind of God. All we k w i what is revealed in Scripture, and what ris himself has said concerning the subject.

Mrs. H. S., Watertown, Conn. By wha legal process did the white man cur from the Indians title to land in A ica?

When the white man first came to A rica the rights of the Indian to his land we ittl respected. In the case of the Dutch i lanhattan Island and of the Friends in P sylvania, title was secured by purchase fr the Indians. The title to the rest of the co nen was held by the various European sov igns by right of discovery. The first settler am with more or less definite grants fron heh sovereigns to certain specified lands. hese grants took into no account any title, tua or implied, of the red men who occupi the land. The grants were surveyed und the authority of the crown, and titles passe rom the crown patentee to subsequent purc sers. When the colonies established their ind ndence from Great Britain, the various ates succeeded to titles held by the colonies der the crown, and the whole area of the o inal grants was eventually surveyed und the authority of the states as existing at th ime or as later constituted. That part the United States west of the Alleghani was largely, and that part west of the Miss ippi was almost wholly, surveyed under t authority of the United States governme before any grants of land were made t ndividuals or to states. In surveying Lo ana and the territory acquired after the M ican war, titles valid under the preceding g ernments were recognized. The land not eld became part of the domain of the nati and was surveyed and transferred under the mestead or other acts to individuals, stat and colleges. The titles which the white man claimed were disputed by the Indians, w resulting conflict. States organized aft the Revolution secured their titles from th government, and cities secured their charter rom the state or territorial governments. lost individual titles in the United Stat are traceable either to the original gover ent deed or to the patentee of some foreig sovereign at one time exercising authority ver the territory in which the property lies.

M. F., Moyock, N. C. Please expla the use of "us" in Gen. 1 : 26.

The manner in which this part of the rrative is approached shows the importance the work to be done—namely, the formatio f a being whom God was to clothe with aut ity as a ruler over the visible world. In th previous acts of his creative power, Go ad merely said, "Let the earth bring forth," Let there be light," and so forth. Now, ho er, he says, "Let us make man." Some hav upposed that God was here addressing him f to the angels and other heavenly hosts, bu hat contention is against the whole tenor of ripture. Others have held that God use the plural form "majestatis," or lofty st in which earthly potentates speak. "The nly proper and consistent explanation is," a prominent commentary puts it, "that his passage, which stands at the very comm cement of revelation, contains an obscure timation of the great mystery of the God ad which was clearly made known by the subsequent and sublime discoveries of the Gospel."

A Pioneer Missionary Called Home

ALL martyrs do not die at the stake nor perish suddenly. Death itself is not always the climax of martyrdom; sometimes it is its relief. And that prolific and always fertile of the church, the blood of the martyrs, may be n—as every noble missionary's life attests—in r ways than through sundered veins. (And yet, ll likelihood, the missionaries would be the last to themselves as examples of martyrdom.)

ioneer missionaries, at any rate, must be accorded glorious crown which the church so willingly es on the brow of a man—after he is dead—who forsaken all, friends, houses, lands and oppor- ty, to carry the message of the Cross and of the ty tomb to heathen lands. Among that band d Horace Grant Underwood, who passed on to reward October 12 last.

is birthplace was in England, his grave is in erica, his monument is in Korea, built of living es.

"Dr. Underwood was among the last of the pioneer sionaries. Hardly any non-Christian land now ains to be opened. Very few missionaries are left hose who went to the great mission fields in the s of beginnings, and they are rapidly passing from sight. There were no foundations laid, no trans- ons or apparatus of any kind prepared for them to e their work easier. They had to do everything themselves in circumstances of great difficulty. at they builded well the strength and proportions the rising churches abundantly prove. It is for se who have come after them, and who are called God to carry on their work, to show like faith and otion, and to pray that a double portion of their it may rest upon us to the end that the good work well begun may be performed until the day of us Christ."

HE field to which Rev. Horace Grant Underwood, D.D., LL.D., devoted his life has made rich ponse. Dr. Underwood (we quote again as in paragraph just above, from an account of this sionary's work by Arthur J. Brown of the Board of reign Missions of the esbyterian urch in the S. A.) was n in Lon- n, England, y 19, 1859, l when a boy thirteen, ne to this ntry with father, a nufacturing emist, the nily home be- in the sub- of Upper rham, New sey. Here race con- sed Christ d united with Reformed urch of the lage. In 1884 was ordained the ministry the Classis the Re- med Church. s purpose, wever, was preach the spel on the eign field, d when he heard that the Presbyterian Board sired a man for Korea, he promptly offered himself. e Board gladly appointed him July 28, 1884, and arrived in Korea, April 5, 1885. The only mis- naries who had preceded him were Horace N. len, M.D., and Mrs. Allen, and they had encoun- red so much suspicion and opposition that they uld have found it difficult to remain if the American inister had not appointed Dr. Allen as physician the Legation. Congenial companionships were few those early days. Foreign-built houses did not exist.

Rev. Horace Grant Underwood, D.D., LL.D.

Sanitary conditions were indescribable. The conveniences to which Americans are accustomed were unknown and mails were infrequent, so that the pioneer missionaries were in a situation of peculiar loneliness, isolation and trial.

But the young missionary began his work with resolution and an ungrudging willingness to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. He was "first" in various ways. He was the first ordained missionary to Korea. He baptized the first convert in 1886. He opened the first school, also in 1886, "The Jesus Doctrine School" it was called. He organized the first church in September, 1887. He administered the first Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in his own house, on Christmas Day of that year, only seven communicants being present. In the same year he made the first of those long itinerating tours into the interior which, continued by him and his successors, spread the knowledge of the Gospel far and wide in Korea and resulted in groups of believers in hundreds of towns and villages. He began the first literary work of Christian missions in Korea and in 1889 published the first of the long list of volumes with which he and other missionaries have enriched the literature of missions. And he was the first to open the Scriptures in written form to the Koreans, his translation of the Gospel of St. Mark in 1887 first making the Word of God accessible to the people.

After ten years of indefatigable labor on the part of Dr. Underwood and the few missionaries of the Presbyterian and the Methodist Boards, there were only one hundred and forty-one Christians in the whole country.

THE tide turned in 1895 when the missionaries in Pyeng Yang displayed conspicuous fidelity, courage and devotion after the battle of Pyeng Yang in the China-Japan War and the missionaries in Seoul manifested equally conspicuous courage and devotion in dealing with an epidemic of cholera. They toiled unceasingly for the sick and dying, performing offices from which the bravest Koreans shrank and exposing themselves without thought of personal danger. Their skilful treatment of the sick saved hundreds of lives. "All these recoveries," says Mrs. Underwood in her book, "made no little stir in the city. Proclamations were posted on the walls telling people there was no need for them to die when they might go to the Christian hospital and live. People who watched missionaries working over the sick night after night said to each other: 'How these foreigners love us! Would we do as much for one of our own kin as they do for strangers?' Some men who saw Dr. Underwood hurrying along the road in the gray twilight of a summer morning remarked: 'There goes the Jesus man; he works all night and all day with the sick, without resting.' 'Why does he do it?' said another. 'Because he loves us,' was the reply. What sweeter reward could be had than that the people should see the Lord in our service."

From that time, the work made rapid progress. All the world now knows how remarkable the development has been until Korea has become one of the most extraordinarily fruitful of missionary fields.

Dr. Underwood had extraordinary influence with high officials and members of the royal family, including the Emperor himself, who often consulted him and sent him a valuable pearl ring as a wedding present. When the Queen was assassinated in 1895, the Emperor, fearing for his own life, turned to Dr. Underwood and two other Americans, and at the royal request they spent the night with him in his private chamber. Along toward morning, the exhausted monarch nestled close to Dr. Underwood and dropped to sleep upon the missionary's shoulder. After the annexation of Korea by the Japanese, the Japanese officials were for a time somewhat suspicious of him in view of his known intimacy with the royal family; when he left Korea for the last time, the authorities showed him marked honor.

Honors were showered upon this eminent missionary. On the field, he held at one time or another every office within the gift of his Mission and the Korean Church. A striking evidence of the high esteem in which he was held was given on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his wedding. March 13th, 1889, he had married Miss Lillias S. Horton, who had gone to Korea as a medical missionary of the Presbyterian Board. March 13th, 1914, nearly all the notable men and women of Korea's capital called to tender their congratulations — members of the consular corps, Japanese officials, Korean nobles, missionaries and Korean Christians of all communions, and faculties and student deputations of schools, while the tables were loaded with presents.

At home the great services of Dr. Underwood were generally recognized. He was once offered the vice-presidency of a great corporation in America with a salary princely in comparison with that which he received as a foreign missionary; but unhesitatingly declined. He walked with God before men, attempting great things for God and expected and received them. He will live in the history of Christianity as one of the founders and builders of the Church in Korea

Talk War to Promote Peace

"ALL this talk in America of war with Japan is a good thing."

I sat bolt upright in the soft leather chair in the parlor of the Tokyo Club and stared at the speaker. I had met him at his office and had taken lunch with him, and we were in the third hour of our discussion of things Japanese and American, of spiritual life, and of election crowds.

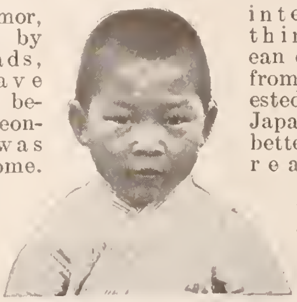
He is a bright-eyed, alert man, with more of a beard than some Japanese can raise, a sharp critic of the government at times, but a most fair-minded and tolerant man. Last year he was visiting Mr. Wanamaker and Mr. Heinz in their homes, in company with that remarkable captain of industry, Baron Shibusawa. Seven years ago he was conducting an Oriental Information Agency in New York. Twenty years ago this fall he was jostled by the 16-to-1 crowd at Madison Square, in a midnight mass of bulletin-watchers, before the modern voting-machine put the owl car on election night out of commission.

He has all the frankness of the American and the vivacity of the Frenchman, qualities which he asserts all the Japanese have beneath a lacquer which is the artificial product of feudalism and the need for self-repression in the trying days before the enlightenment. Like many another leader of Japanese life and thought, he was an early graduate of the Sapporo Agricultural College, the Hokkaido incubator of tolerant thought and far-sighted education.

He has served for years as a newspaper man in Japan and Korea. His talk falls into the model paragraphs we learned in rhetoric class but forget to use, with a key sentence at the beginning and a summing up or conclusion at the end. A chance epigram which I pigeonholed for future reference was this: "Modern life cannot long exist on a material basis." He traveled for many months as companion to the honored Prince Ito, and is now the active and able editor of a review which has won a respected place for itself in its six months of life.

Ever since coming to Japan I have been humiliated by the occasional cries of "Wolf! Wolf!" which have emanated from certain papers in the United States, regarding them as unwarranted affronts of a sensitive people; so Mr. Motosada Zumoto, the Omega of my interviewing trip through "Who's Who," and editor of the Herald of Asia, startled me by his advocacy of war talk as a means of promoting peace.

"It may be, as some people say, that a certain journal brought about the war with Spain," Mr. Zumoto continued, "but the cause of that war was reflected even in presidential messages several generations earlier. That war was inevitable, and popular clamor, stimulated by scare heads, simply gave occasion for beginning a conflict that was bound to come. But war talk in America at present promotes friendship for Japan, because it promotes interest; and thinking men can only emerge from an interested study of Japan with a better and more reasonable friendship for our country.



Raw material

"If there were any danger of war, this would not be the case. Talk of such a kind would then be criminal. But just as truly as war between the United States and Spain was inevitable, so peace between Japan and America is inevitable, since our interests in the Pacific and in the Asiatic continent are identical. All the interests in America as well as in Japan are on the side of peace, which, as your writers are fond of saying, will make the ocean between us pacific in fact as well as in name.

"Hobson and Leslie Shaw are thus our friends, for Japan has always admired those enemies who fight in the open. They have directed such attention to Japan as can only result in a better understanding between the two peoples. Back of these honest men there are, of course, organizations who seek, not actually to involve the two nations in war, but to gain wealth from the larger navy and greater preparedness which results from the fear of a foe, no matter how remote or small. The men who are now making ammunition for use in Europe have built up factories which otherwise will prove a dead loss when war is over.

"Japan's patriotism is founded on loyalty to an Emperor"—The Crown Prince (at rear) visits an exhibition in Tokyo

"I have the utmost confidence in the American sense of fair play, and in the power of the press to curb improper moves on the part of the government. Instances of this sort are the Venezuelan controversy and the proposal for the neutralization of the Manchurian railways, while Philander Knox was your Secretary of State. When Americans understand the mission Japan is trying to fulfil in the Far East, we shall not only have her confidence, but her active support.

"We Japanese have studied Chinese history as carefully as our own, and we know that, while China has often been conquered, the conservative masses of that colossal land have conquered and absorbed every conqueror. We have absolutely no desire for territorial expansion at the expense of China, as her friendship will increasingly become our most valuable possession. A change in our government is imminent, and it is made necessary by the bungling handling of our relations with China. The new government will be selected with the idea of dealing with China in a more considerate and friendly manner. When our domestic politics have cleared sufficiently to leave our leaders with a free hand to act, the sincerity of our motives will be evident to all.

Finance and Industry

"China offers a rare field for American and Japanese cooperation in the financing and administration of industrial projects. Managers and superintendents can be secured in America, and under-managers and foremen of sufficient skill can be had for much ss money by employing Japanese. In financing ch projects, America is the country with whom Japa se financiers are most willing to trust their comparati ly small investments, for we are convinced of the poli al disinterestedness of the United States in the Far I st. China is clamoring for money for development nd trained men to inaugurate new industries. J an and America can furnish these aids without poli al aggression or the abolishment of the Open Door he preservation of which is as advantageous and re essential to us than to you. With you, it is an altru ic ideal. With us, it is an economic necessity."

I spoke to Mr. Zumoto about the high prote on Japan gives some of her industries, and of her atte pts to manufacture some things that she could pr re more cheaply elsewhere. I compared Japan in is with my attitude when I was a small boy taking ne friends out for a ride in a boat which I had hire I said, "It is my boat, and I'm going to row." he Japanese are putting themselves to much unnece ry trouble because it is their nation, and in it they i ist on being supreme. Foreign participation in Japa se firms is discouraged

"It is true," Mr. Zumoto added, "that we should uy some products from other nations rather than att pt to produce them. But there is one exception, in w ch Japan is justified in manufacturing her own pro ts rather than importing them, even if in doing s he pays higher prices or gets inferior materials. Th is the iron and steel industry. It is our ty to be able to produce these neces ies ourselves, as we should otherwise be pless in case of war. We have no w im mind, but, like the Americans, we ist give heed to the necessity for prepare ss measures."

I spoke of Carl Crow's book, "J an and America," in which he asserts tha he two nations have nothing in com on, in either ideals or life; and that Ja 's patriotism is founded on loyalty t an emperor, while America's patriotis is founded on a popular desire for fre m and liberty. Mr. Zumoto had not rea he book, but thinks that such assertion re not founded on fact.

"It is true that our people are loy to the emperor," he said; "yet for ny years our emperors have made no impo nt step without submitting the matter t he representatives of the people. Our em or is more democratic in governmental a irs than your president. There is a gro ng democratic tendency among our peopl —a tendency which has already had its ect on our system of government. The s timent for freedom and liberty is not s ar advanced as with you; but where doe ne find thinking men who do not hold ch human ideals?

But at the same time some dependence is being plac on guardians like this had my most impressive lesson in the inher- lemocracy of your people on election night 96, in New York City. I was out with the s until after midnight. Every available place d Madison Square was packed. The excitewas intense, as the bi-metallism issue was very nent. Yet time and again, as men stepped v feet or jostled me, they stopped to beg my n. This attitude toward one another, even in nidst of a governmental crisis, convinced me the people could well be entrusted with the nment. When they are so considerate of their s, they will handle the government in the spirit."

. Zumoto spoke also of the eve of the election in last year, when the report was spread that the had been mobilized in connection with the China ion. This so aroused the popular imagination upport that the government party secured the d victory at the polls. Later it was seen that the ry movement was not a general mobilization in ense, but simply a shifting of garrisons in Man- a, the old garrisons returning as the new ones d.

as anxious to get the views of this candid editor ding Christianity. He is a Buddhist, but holds st sympathetic view.

don't think that there is great prospect of Chris- ing either Japan or China," he explained. turies of misgovernment in Korea have made welcome Christianity as a vital force, and a from the hardships and sorrows of generations. n Japan, for every ten men who turn from the ng type of Buddhism, Shintoism or Confucian- eight will substitute an individualistic belief rather than accept Christianity. The elasticity of Buddhism insures its perpetuation as a great religion in the future, as it has been in the past. But the coming belief in Japan is neither materialism nor Christianity. It is a personal, undefined belief, which every man formulates for himself. It is the belief that your leading thinkers in America hold. Theoretically, they are Christians. But they are not orthodox. It is not materialism. Modern life cannot long exist on a material basis. Man has need of a spiritual life.

"The missionaries of the earliest days in Japan were broad men, but they were followed by men who were lacking in education and who were bigoted."

This was the third or fourth time that I had heard this from prominent men, and I had suspected that it was the polite way of saying that bigotry and poor education are still causes for any lack of respect that may exist toward the missionaries. I knew that Mr. Zumoto would state the thing point-blank if asked.

The "Bigotry" Note Again

"Yes," he said, "there still remains some bigotry on the part of the missionaries; but I am told that things are improving in this direction. But such men as Verbeck, Brown and Clark are not common today. One young Confucianist, in telling of his first meeting with Dr. Verbeck, said: 'I thought that one of the ancient sages stood before me.'"

I mentioned the difficulty with which Japanese students in America adapt themselves to American life.

"That is a survival of the old feudal system, which made us lower our eyes in the presence of those we respect. It is an artificial veneer and will eventually disappear. But a more important cause is our lamentable and inexcusable inability to speak your language fluently. Our students study English for ten years and are then unable to express themselves. We should have more American teachers, who would use the direct or conversational method in language work.

"One last thing I should like to mention, and that is our so-called pride. I can receive you here at this club as man to man and we can talk freely. But the ordinary Japanese home is not fitted for intercourse with foreigners. Our kitchens cannot prepare foreign food. Our mattings are marred by the use of tables and chairs. Our wives are not accustomed to meeting strangers, and do not speak foreign languages. Visitors are compelled to take off their shoes, and if they have holes in their socks, that is embarrassing for them. Under such conditions, intercourse has been in the past rather difficult. We do not like to accept hospitality without being able to reciprocate. Reciprocity is a national trait of the Japanese. We respond very quickly to friendship or suspicion."

We parted with expressions of mutual friendship, and as I walked back to the hotel, where the fly-by-night tourist treats his "boy" with indifference or even contempt, I thought of the hundred times when, far from those who could speak my language and forced to the most awkward manipulation of a balky phrase-book, I had been treated as a friend by these very human people. Friendship and politeness will carry one far with the Japanese. They reciprocate.

H. I. H. Hirohito

n Prince of Japan, just re- ly installed with ceremonies heir to the throne of his ancestors

THE Boston Transcript in an editorial has this to say on the situation in the Far East: "We are on the eve of a crisis in the Far East. There is no doubt about that.

"The reason for this crisis lies neither in America nor in China, but solely in Japan. Japan has arrived at what many experienced, tolerant, cautious observers, both Japanese and foreigners, regard as the crucial turning-point in her national life. Two roads lie in front of the Japanese people and their Government. One of these roads is smooth, well-oiled and offering peculiarly ng temptations to militant sons of the Samurai, to se Japanese, high and low, who seek success mainly the sword. Not so immediately attractive or nising is the other road, but if steadfastly followed ill lead to a greater Japan, whose influence will nt far more in world history.

It is not without reason that the newspapers and odicals of the United States view with uneasiness unting almost to alarm the succession of Field Marshal Count Terauchi to the Premiership of Japan. This is not an incident; it is not merely an event; it might mean an epoch.

"A timely article about Field Marshal Terauchi appears in the last issue of the Japan Magazine to reach the United States. It is written by Mr. R. Usaki, who tells us that 'Terauchi's abilities have always shone more brilliantly in the war office than on the field of battle. He has remained the genius of the military headquarters staff.

"'In May, 1910, he was made Governor-General or Resident-General of Korea. The wonderful manner in which Count Terauchi mastered the situation in that much disturbed country, Korea, increased, if that were possible, the nation's confidence in him as a man to be trusted. He had hardly been a month in office at Seoul when he had the police powers of the Korean Government in his hands, and then he took precaution to station Japanese soldiers in every province. By the month of August the work of annexation was complete and that fact made known to the treaty powers. The King of Korea assumed the rank of a Prince, and the Resident-General was supreme over the country. One of the most marvelous feats of the new administration was its successful annexation of the country without giving the Koreans a chance to carry on effectively their wonted intrigues. That so great an event could have been carried out so quietly was the wonder of the world. The effectiveness with which the great feat was accomplished must be attributed to the genius of the Resident-General.'

"This is not a sensationalist American anti-Japanese indictment of Terauchi in Korea. It is the record and the language of a personal friend and a Japanese.

"The last issue of the Far Eastern Review, which has just arrived in the United States in the mails, contains an article entitled, 'The Man of the Hour in Japan.' It was written while the Japanese militarists were pressing the claims of Marshal Terauchi, but before the actual fall of the Okuma cabinet. Among other things, this article says:

"'The political cauldron in Japan is again seething and a change of cabinet is imminent. There are big things to be done, while "the opportunity of a thousand years" remains open. While the great war is in progress and the Presidential campaign is monopolizing the attention of America; while no Power in the world can interfere, the Japanese jingoes believe that the hour has struck for them to act and make good their claims to full control over China. They must face the Powers, after the war, with the accomplished fact.

"'The stage has been carefully prepared for the final act in the great drama. But Marquis Okuma hesitated to act. He is too spineless to suit the military and bureaucratic element in Japan. They clamor for his resignation, so a "strong man" can take his place and carry on their program. So the militarists of Japan turn to the one man who can deliver the stroke quietly, neatly and with dispatch; the man who forged the fetters on the liberties of Korea; the idol of the army and the future leader of the powerful Choshu Clan, who dictate the military policy of the nation. Field Marshal Count Terauchi, Governor-General of Chosen, the silent, cynical, deliberate and masterful soldier-statesman, is the man selected to head a new cabinet. He is the Man of the Hour, the man especially equipped to deal the blow.'"

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

NINETY per Cent at Church. Sunday, October 29, was the third annual "Go-to-Church Sunday" in Greater New York. The Protestant churches of New York carry on their rolls 186,380 members. According to actual count, 168,200 persons attended church on this anniversary, although it is possible that some of this number may have been drawn by the one hundred fiftieth anniversaries of old St. Paul's and of John Street Methodist Church, as well as by the fact that in the Lutheran and Reformed churches the celebration of the quadri-centennial of the Reformation received its first official recognition on this Sunday.

China Destroys Poppies. Chinese troops have been recalled from the Kwangtung-Fukien border to assist in the destruction of poppies, the cultivation of which is said to have greatly increased in the Tungan district during the unsettled period after the first Chinese revolution. The opium planters are expected to offer resistance.

Europe's Largest Dam. American engineers are reported to have recently completed in Catalonia, Spain, the largest dam in Europe. The dam closes the valley of the Noguera Pallaresa River near the town of Talarn. It is of concrete, 330 feet in height, 700 feet long and 230 feet thick at the base, the abutments resting in almost perpendicular cliffs. The dam forms an artificial lake, 15½ miles long and three-quarters of a mile wide. The water will be used for the production of electric power and for irrigation purposes. Nearly all the machinery used in the construction of the dam was American and was hauled by American traction engines over a road eleven miles long, parts of which were cut through the canyon at heavy expense.

The High Cost of Government. Taxes alone do not represent the total cost of government in America; part of it is the cost of getting a government. Reports of the campaign funds of the two leading parties made public on October 29 show that at that date the Republican National Committe had received $1,667,750.29 to cover the expenses of the presidential campaign, and the Democratic National Committee had received $1,006,283. Nor was this all. Each committee expected to receive in the neighborhood of half a million more in the course of the final week of the campaign. These amounts do not include the individual expenses of candidates, nor the expenditures of state committees from their own treasuries, nor the expenditures of public-spirited citizens of both parties made in various ways in the interests of the campaign.

The Brand Not Mentioned. On October 29 Dr. Stephen Langdon, formerly of Oxford University, and now curator of the Babylonian section of the University of Pennsylvania Museum, opened a letter written 2,200 years B.C., and never delivered. The letter was opened with a mallet, as it was sealed in a clay cylinder. It was written in Sumerian characters, and when deciphered with great difficulty proved to be a Babylonian merchant's order for a shipment of flour.

New Greek Minister. Demetrios G. Metaxas, formerly Greek minister at London, will replace M. Caclamanos as Greek Minister at Washington. M. Caclamanos, although appointed in 1914, had not left Greece, and was supplanted because of his espousal of the Venizelos cause.

Climate Chief Physician. According to an article by Dr. J. B. Fisher, medical director of the Jewish Consumptives' Relief Association of California, in a recent issue of the Medical Record, climate is still the chief element in the successful treatment of tuberculosis. He says: "From time immemorial to the present day—the era of serum-therapy—climate has always ranked high in the treatment of tuberculosis. During this time, it is true, many a drug has earned short-lived fame as a positive cure for consumption. It is equally true that since 1882, when Koch put his index on the tubercle bacillus, many a serum has met the same fate, but climate has held its own. And while we feel that the time is not far distant when we shall have a specific for tuberculosis, we must necessarily continue to place our faith in such factors as have stood the test of time. Chief among these are climate, rest, diet and general hygiene."

Just Some More "Chicken Feed." On the 28th of October, 1,800,000 of the new dimes were put in circulation. The face of the new dime shows a Liberty head in profile, while the reverse shows a bundle of rods about a battle-ax, this being the symbol of unity; an olive wreath surrounds the central design, denoting peace. It was announced on the 30th that coinage might be suspended on the new dime, as it had been discovered that the monogram of the artist who designed the coin appears prominently on the face. While there is no law governing the matter, it has been the practice to eliminate identifying marks of this class, as was done in the case of the first Lincoln penny.

Exports that Feed the War. In a speech at Cincinnati during the campaign, President Wilson declared that our ammunition shipments constituted less than one per cent. of our total commerce. In making this statement the President referred to both the domestic and foreign commerce, our internal commerce being estimated as in excess of $100,000,000,000 a year, while our total exports of munitions of all kinds are slightly less than $1,000,000,000. The figures upon which the President based his estimate were given out on October 26 and show that in addition to shipments of more than half a billion dollars of explosives there were shipped from the United States in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916, horses to the value of $73,531,000 against $3,000,000 worth in 1914; mules, $22,916,000 against $690,000; barbed wire, $39,000,000; railway cars, $167,742,000; corn, $30,780,000 against $983,000 in 1914; brass, $164,875,000 against $7,000,000. Automobiles valued at $97,464,000 and automobile parts valued at $22,536,000 were shipped to European countries in 1916.

Seeking More Light. The railroads and the railway brotherhoods clashed again on October 13 in a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission of a controversy over the use of electric headlights on locomotives. The brotherhoods have asked the commission for a tentative order requiring railroads to install electric headlights. A great many engineers desire the headlights because of their illuminating power, and a great many others o pos them because they blind the engin r c an approaching train.

In th tw years since the first opening of the na to commerce, during which time wa closed by the Culebra slides for ou six months, 2,097 ships have p se through the canal. The total qu tit of cargo carried by them was 9,0 61 long tons.

It was ounced on November 2 that the tish government had arranged to turn over to Chile, as compensation for two battleships building for Chile in British shipyards which were taken over by Britain at the beginning of the war, five of the submarines built for Britain in America, which the American government interned until the end of the war.

Underseas Freighter Returns. The submarine freighter Deutschland completed her second voyage to American ports on November 1, docking at New London, Conn. She brought a cargo of about 500 tons, said to be valued at $10,000,000. Although the exact nature of the cargo is not declared, it is said to contain securities and precious stones and some rare drugs. Captain Koenig of the Deutschland is reported to have admitted that the Bremen, the sister ship of the Deutschland, was lost at sea on her first trip. He declared that the German government had positive knowledge that the Bremen had been lost in an accident, due either to a storm or a collision, and that she had not been captured by the enemy. The Deutschland made her present trip in twenty-one days, and expected to sail on the return trip in about two weeks.

New Long Distance Record. Victor Carlstrom, flying on November 2 under the auspices of the New York Times in a Curtiss biplane in an attempt to make a non-stop Chicago to New York flight, was forced by the loosening of a nut on the carburetor to make a landing at Erie, Pa. While failing in his original purpose, he nevertheless broke the American non-stop record, flying 452 miles in 4 hours 17½ minutes. The best previous record, which Carlstrom himself held, was made May 21, 1916, in a flight from Newport News to New York, 416 miles in 4 hours and 1 minute.

World Conflagration Makes Coal High. In the latter days of October the price of hard coal started skyward along the Atlantic coast, and there were evidences of a probable scarcity through the country. New York City, which is accustomed to paying in the neighborhood of six dollars a ton, was paying seven dollars and a quarter on September 1, and the retail price in some portions of New York City had gone as high as thirteen dollars by November 1, with the comforting suggestion made in some quarters that it might reach twenty dollars. This sky-rocketing price was reported to be due partly to an attempt to ship as much coal as possible westward before the close of lake navigation, and largely to the shortage of cars due to the use of coal cars for the carrying of ore, and to the sidetracking of loaded coal cars for more remunerative traffic, which in a great many cases is munitions of war. Another factor is the withdrawal from the mines of much labor, attracted to the munition factories by the higher prices there paid. Men in close touch with the business advise consumers to buy sparingly for the present, assuring them that the transportation factor will improve later, and that lower prices will result.

Parral Reported in Hands of Villa. Dispatches from Chihuahua City on November 2, which were supported by information reaching American army officers from other sources, told of the taking of Parral in Chihuahua by Villista forces. Villa had last been reported near Santa Rosalia, forty-five miles from Parral. The American-Mexican Joint Commission adjourned its sittings from November 2 to 10, and Secretary Lane in announcing this fact expressed the opinion that an agreement would be reached soon after the 10th. It was reported on October 27 that General Carranza had formally announced his candidacy for the presidency. Carranza claims to have defeated the forces of Felix Diaz. Reports from other sources credit Diaz with gaining ground. Some persons claiming a knowledge of the situation report the Carranza government as steadily losing power, while other reports show it proceeding carefully and successfully in restoring normal civil life throughout most of the republic. It is announced that since July 20 the President has accepted the resignation of more than 500 National Guard officers who were serving on the Mexican border.

Fragments of News. The Carnegie Hero Commission at its fall meeting in Pittsburg on October 27 recognized fifty-two acts of heroism and awarded the appropriate medals. St. Louis has solved the problem of finding a policeman when needed by installing searchlights at street intersections and training the shaft of light upon the post of the traffic patrolman. The illuminated guardian of the peace is thus protected from reckless drivers. . . . On the 12th of October, United States Secret Service agents arrested in Santa Cruz, Calif., one H. R. Wilkin, who is said to be the most expert counterfeiter ever operating in the United States. Wilkin had found a way to manufacture paper in exact imitation of that upon which the United States currency is printed. *A SERMON BY REV. S. PARKES CADMAN, D.D.

TEXT: The Beatitudes. Matt. 5 and Luke 6.

THE idea of a blessed life has been the polar star of the human voyage across the ocean of Time, toward the haven of Eternity. Ancient philosophers sought for it in the "summum bonum," which was their answer to the query; "In what does the blessedness of mortal existence consist?" Other conclusions varied from theirs and from one another. Gautama the Buddha, the "Enlightened One," taught that man could only secure peace in practical oblivion. The final extinction of all desire, aspiration, effort, and even of personality itself, was the one worthy goal of the faithful. This theory involved nothing more nor less than spiritual suicide. Strictly speaking, from the religious standpoint Buddhism is an unrelieved Sahara of the dreariest negation and atheism.

Diametrically opposed to its despair and nothingness is the great message of the divine Lord, "I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." He revealed to the grateful perception of the race the sanctity and value of humanity and its eternal place in the perfected economy of the kingdom of heaven. His earthly life was a demonstration of the essential worth of man. His teaching enlarged upon this glorious reality as conveyed in the Incarnation. His death and resurrection completed the establishment of the fact that God dwells in us and that we are his people. "Because I live," decreed the Master, "ye shall live also." And his mediatorial sovereignty is exercised in behalf of the purification of believers, to whom the apostle said, "Christ in you, the hope of glory." Again, this hope was distinguished by its catholicity. All who will may share in its assurance and its bliss. Aristotle, pursuing the same matter, arrived at the cheerless verdict that the blessed life was possible only for a small number. He excluded slaves, paupers, the poor, the diseased, and the unfortunate. One has but to read the first Beatitude to note the contrast between the widsom of this world and the grace of God which has abounded toward us in Christ Jesus. "Blessed are ye poor!" "Blessed are ye that hunger!" "Blessed are ye that weep!" These are the expressions of the Christian doctrine of beatification. It is as though they declared the miserable to be the chosen offspring of God; the poverty-stricken the possessors of the heavenly prize. However the Beatitudes are estimated, two things are perfectly clear: First, they owed nothing to Greek or Roman Stoicism, which at its best was a hard and crushing creed, enjoining passive resignation to inevitable and incurable evils. Every man dwelt alone in a silent Gethsemane of his own. None kept vigil with him; none pitied, none helped him. Hence his best course was to endure and say nothing.

Our Lord, on the contrary, was moved with compassion for the shepherdless multitudes. He wept and rejoiced with them. His sympathy toward them was the breath of his ministerial service, the mainspring of his beneficial activities. Instead of regarding sin and injustice and oppression and kindred evil as unescapable and inculcating submission to a ruthless and tyrannical fate, Jesus asserted that they could be transmuted into man's highest good. He rescued those who dwelt in darkness and in the shadow of death, and imparted to them the illuminating splendors of a changeless destiny of excellence. Through the tender mercy of our God, the dayspring from on high visited these strangers and captives and guided their feet into the way of peace.

Again, although the Beatitudes silenced an unbearable dilemma, which had caused the earth to abound with iniquity and horror, Jesus did not imply that cheap and irrational optimism which either denies sin its consequent evils, or endeavors to fritter them away by spurious explanations. Sin did rage and riot, and it brought a legion of penalties in its train. But it could be overcome; its victims could be redeemed; its results obliterated. This laudable end was not to be gained by playing fast and loose with intelligence or with morality, but by the reception in man of "a new life," which was and is "the free gift of God in Jesus Christ." For "to as many as thus received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

THE way is now open to consider the Beatitudes, which fall into two groups: those addressed to the people generally, and those meant for the disciples alone. Luke gives us their original and concise form, which was afterward extended and preserved in the Gospel of Matthew. Not necessarily the poor in material affairs, but the poor in spirit; and those who hunger, not after meat and drink, but after righteousness, are the truly blessed ones. It is intrinsically probable that these opening sentences of the Sermon on the Mount were specifically meant for the destitute and outcast Israelites who had been subdued by the Roman Empire and betrayed by their own leaders. They had few rights and no privileges; their lot was a ceaseless round of toil, taxation, privation and care, without a glimpse of betterment. Condemned by the political and ecclesiastical magnates who systematically exploited them, they were flung aside to the rubbish heap with contempt and loathing. I think of them gathered around the young prophet of Galilee, conscious that at last they had found a friend. The scrutiny of poverty's keen eyes was upon him as he spoke. They speedily changed from distrust to confidence, then to eager expectation. And when he vindicated his Messiahship in answer to John the Baptist's fears, the integral part of his message was, not that he wrought wondrous miracles at which even his enemies marveled, but that "the poor have the Gospel preached unto them." "Come unto me," he cried, "all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." Further, he insisted that though we are saved by faith, we are judged by works, by the benevolent deeds, the kindnesses, his professed followers render to the sick, the naked, the imprisoned—a service of pity and of love which Christ accepts as done to him personally, because he has so completely identified himself with the abject of the earth. One can attempt to visualize the scene when he announced that the kingdom of God was the heritage of those deserted masses. The tone of his voice, the light in his look, the animation of his delivery, stamped the radiant news upon the hearts of his listeners. We are not surprised to learn that their eyes were fastened on him. The dawn had broken; it was glad, confident morning; never again would they be bereft as they had been.

CERTAINLY Jesus did not mean that poverty and hunger, in and of themselves, made those who suffered them fit for the Kingdom. There is no saving virtue in poverty and no inevitable vice in wealth, as such. Both are exactly what we make them by our spiritual handling. Yet, on the whole, religious advantage lies with poverty rather than with affluence. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the Kingdom!" Here Jesus spoke from experience. His movement was almost entirely a poor man's movement. The so-called superior ones, socially, despised and rejected him and compassed his death. That experience has frequently been repeated in the history of the church. She has had to encounter the perils of kingly patronage and the simonies of the wealthy who entertained the vulgar superstition that character can be purchased with gold. Hence those who were last on earth in esteem and influence have been first in the Kingdom. Its heroes and saints were not distracted by possessions, nor damaged by pride, nor restrained by dread of conventional judgments. They were driven to the faith which is beyond faith, and which does not simply believe that it believes, but lays hold on the central verities of God and depends on him as the solitary but sufficient refuge.

One door was always open to their approach. No self-contented children of prosperity could shut it—the door of that realm which did not consist in meat and drink, but in "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." That Kingdom was not found in perishable pomp and retinue. The humble, lowly, trustful spirit was its royal chamber. It was within the reach of the most forlorn, and they were the likeliest to receive it gladly. Blessed indeed is the man or woman who has thus discovered the secret of the Lord, and who, from the living center of a regenerated soul, is made the victor over outward circumstances.

TURNING for a moment to the four beatitudes addressed more particularly to the disciples, we observe that they indicate the distinctive attributes of the Christian character. These are mercifulness or pity, purity or singleness of motive, peaceableness or the passion for tranquillity through justice. All originate in the Divine nature which is implanted in believers. For what is the Gospel if not the good tidings that God is merciful and gracious, slow to anger and of great kindness? Does it not speak of him as the holy Father, in whose light of purity there is no darkness at all; as the God of peace which is lasting, because it is based on equity and right? So are we to practice mercy and never to check its healing streams; to be more than morally correct in our purity, which binds us to the purposes of salvation in absolute loyalty and devotion; to seek peace and pursue it, that in a blood-stained generation we may be called the children of God.

An undivided and resolute determination to place the interests of the Kingdom above all other concerns is sure to bring us into the more immediate presence and vision of God. Our expanding spiritual consciousness will realize more and more the fulness of his benison, the strength and consolation of his indwelling Spirit. Here is the charter and the obligation of our high calling in Christ Jesus. It has no meaning for the unjust or the pitiless. They do not recognize its claims, nor crave the fruit of righteousness, which comes from "that wisdom," comments St. James, "which is first pure, then peaceable, and without hypocrisy." Such a peace,

The Brooding Spirit

SUNDAY, November 19. Gen. 1 :2. "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Some time ago, out on the Atlantic, far beyond the sight of land, I saw a cloud whose outlines to the form of a great bird. Its mighty wings were st hed out so as to touch the two horizons, and it med like a mother-bird brooding over the entire de. I recalled the word in Genesis which I have wr en above, and the marvelous cloud became to me a s bol of the most real but invisible presence of the L brooding over the varied waters of human life. ndeed that is the eternal yearning of the motherhe of God, to brood over all its circumstances, wi out and within, and to impress everything with th nystic virtues of the divine breast.

e divine Spirit would brood over the dancing, fr some waters of our joys. And it is the miracle of ace that, when the Lord countenances a joy, it is rangely enhanced. He adds sunshine to daylig. He transmutes happiness into blessedness. He er ws our delights with heavenly virtue. The joy of th Lord becomes our strength. No one has ever ta d really superlative joy until there has brooded ov his gladness the transforming and beautifying Sp t of God.

d he will brood over our labor when we are doing ou daily business in great waters. He delights to gl fy the common lot and common toil. It is his pu ose to hallow the commonplace, the vast world of th ordinary in which we earn our daily bread. In e Angelus," in which Millet pictures two peasants, m and woman, standing with bowed heads as the b of evening send across the fields the call to p er, the painter has thrown a softening light not o upon the humble worshipers, but also upon the sp le and wheelbarrow, the common implements of th toil. And that is right; the Light of Life will il ine the means by which we earn our bread and th eby transform them into a means of grace. When th Great Spirit broods over our business, it becomes o Father's business.

nd he will brood over the waters of our sorrows. S etimes these waters roar and are troubled, and m y precious things in our lives "shake with the s ling thereof." But the brooding Spirit will give us r when "all without tumultuous seems." We may h e the refuge of his bosom "while the nearer waters r while the tempest still is high." The waters can d s no hurt so long as we are resting against the b om of God.

nd the same great Spirit will brood over the w ers of death. Those waters reveal themselves in d erent ways to different pilgrims. Sometimes they a very high and overflow their banks. Sometimes t are so shallow that one can almost go over drys d. But whether the floods are out, or the passage i lmost dry, the faithful Spirit broods upon the w ers and the soul is kept in perfect peace.

When I tread the verge of Jordan,
Bid my anxious fears subside;
Bear me through the swelling current,
Land me safe on Canaan's side.

Gives Soul-Peace to Those Who Trust Him

MONDAY, November 20. Ps. 34 :22. "The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants." Satan, says of the Puritans, cannot tempt longer than God ll give him leave; and God will never suffer thee be tempted beyond measure. We are called to t under the banner of Jesus, and directly he sees t we are overset by our foes, that they are too ny for us, and that we are on the point of being rwhelmed, he will hasten to step in between us l them.

atan's drift in tempting is to dishearten and perx; to terrorize, and to drive to despair; but if thou e heart and rest quietly in this promise, thou shalt be left desolate or condemned. They that hate e shall be condemned, but thou shalt never be connned.

t is recorded of some of the wounded prisoners in hospitals of Europe, that they are being driven d by remorse for the acts of savage cruelty in ich they have taken part, and the wards are filled h their bitter cries of self-reproach. This, surely, the bitterest ingredient of the torment of the lost. t they who trust in the Lord realize the grace of fect forgiveness. How can they be desolate, who ve the friendship of their great Deliverer! And who ne that condemneth since Jesus died, and rose from the dead, and for ever lives to intercede! Faith, however small, will bring God out of his heaven to stand at thy side and vindicate thee!

The Broader Patriotism

TUESDAY, November 21. Rev. 5 :9. "And they sing a new song." The love of one's country and the desire to protect it against evil and wrong finds warrant in the Bible; that blind patriotism that can see the God of every tribe and tongue and people and nation solely and only interested in one nation is not Biblical, nor is it Christian.

The rich gift that Christianity has brought to the world lies in the belief of the limitless love of God for all the children of men. Out of that love there grows a wide tolerance, and a desire to see God's will fulfilled among all his people everywhere. This is the nerve of missions, and it is the sole hope of universal brotherhood upon the earth.

To be true to one's own native land and still to realize the goodness and the devotion of those who were born under another flag—that is indeed a quality that grows out of Christian culture and a constant consciousness of God's Fatherhood of all. This goal of Christian brotherhood, this stretching forward to the time when no nation will feel that it liveth to itself alone, seems far away at present. Yet every great Christian sees it by faith, and already possesses it in his heart.

A blind patriot is a citizen or subject who forgets that only as all nations of the earth prosper and become truly great and good does the will of God fulfil itself. The Christian strives to take the viewpoint of his heavenly Father, working for a kingdom where there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, where men are all one in Christ Jesus.

The Divine Power Working in Us

WEDNESDAY, November 22. Rom. 1 :16. "It is the power of God unto salvation." Paul was facing great Rome. He was anticipating the hour when, in the heart of the metropolis of the world, the home of philosophy, oratory, art, and triumph, he should proclaim himself a devoted lover and disciple of the Nazarene, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate. He knew what was meant by power, and what Rome meant by it. Rome exercised an iron despotism over mankind. But in the metropolis of the world's power he claimed to be able to set forth a still greater power. For this, the world of that day was dying. It had systems of philosophy and morals.

Men like Seneca and Marcus Aurelius shine like stars in the sky of the ancient world for their high code of morals. But how to perform that which was good did not appear. "I found not!" had been the cry of Paul himself. All this had been altered, however, since he had come to know Jesus Christ. From the risen Lord, there had streamed into his nature currents of living power, which had enabled him to fulfil God's commandments, place his foot on evil passion, and live a pure and holy life.

Such a power awaits us also. But we must claim and appropriate it by union with Jesus Christ.

Likable People

THURSDAY, November 23. II Sam. 1 :26. "Very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful." These are the words of David, spoken in the "Song of the Bow" about Jonathan, his much-loved friend.

George Matheson has said that if he were writing the epitaph of Jonathan, he would write this: "I have made many glad." Jonathan must have been a likable soul. In reading his biography one might conclude that he was frequently excessive in his generosity and without restraint when it came to sacrificing his own interests for the sake of others. He was not only generous, loving and delicately thoughtful in relation to his bosom friend, David. He was not like some, extremely open-handed and fine within the limits of a private friendship, and outside of that boundary often hard and cruel. His generous nature was broader than his friendship, carrying with it beauty, fragrance and radiance wherever he went. He was what one might call rich in humanitarian sympathy. He liked to make people happy. No personal discomfort stood in the way of his generous outgoing.

Should not Christianity, real Christianity, make people likable? What shall we say of those heavy-handed, tedious persons who seemingly would make religion a monopoly if they could, taking delight in chiding happiness, and seeing the sinister side of people?

"Who are the people in this short life of ours," asks Mr. Benson, "whom one remembers with deep and abiding gratitude? Not those who have rebuked and punished and satirized and humiliated us, striking down the stricken and flattening the prostrate; but the people who have been patient with us, and kind; who have believed in us, and comforted us, and welcomed us, and forgiven us everything."

If our religion does not make us likable, should we not examine it to see if it is real?

THE QUEST

By Ralph M. Thomson

Not in The sky afar,
Beyond the last,
Pale star; —

Nor on
The earth below,
Among the things
That grow; —

Nor yet
Beneath the waves,
In the sea's dark,
Deep caves; —

But look
For God, apart
From these, in your

Christian Magnanimity

FRIDAY, November 24. Acts 20 :32. "I commend you to God and to the word of his grace." We associate intellectual strength and untiring energy with the great apostle, and are apt to forget his tender love and yearning for the welfare of his converts. His was one of the tenderest hearts that ever beat. It was not only a warm heart but a tender heart, with intense affections, lively emotions, and quick tears. He had willingly given up the right to lead about with him a sister or wife, because he desired the utmost liberty for the proclamation of his message; but the very loneliness of his life made him more open to the sacred ties that bound him to his disciples.

Think of the large number of brethren and sisters enumerated by name at the end of most of his epistles, and greeted with special messages, which are precisely adapted to character and need. His love was warmly and nobly reciprocated by a Priscilla and Aquila who had risked their lives for him, by an Andronicus and a Julia who had shared his prison, by a Persis and a Rufus! And what better could they do, at that supreme hour, than part in God? He handed back the charge of the flock to the Great Shepherd himself. He knew how much grace would be needed, but never doubted that it would be forthcoming. And there he left it!

The Song of the Thankful Heart

SATURDAY, November 25. Ps. 100 :5. "For the Lord is good; his mercy endureth for ever." Shall we not at this glad Thanksgiving time sing carols instead of dirges? Are not the blessings a thousandfold more than the sorrows? "Count your mercies, name them one by one." As a nation, business is prosperous, wealth and population increases, peace prevails, liberty rules, the spirit of reciprocity and brotherhood is breathed forth; among the nations of the world our influence is vast. Our missions are illuminating all lands, encouraging empires to become republics.

The invoice of individual blessings is surely great. God in Christ is our Saviour, heaven our home, immortality our legacy, Providence our protector. We enjoy liberty of conscience, freedom of speech, watchfulness over the interests of the home, the social life, our business employments and the pursuit of happiness. Let us enumerate some of the comforts and conveniences that have come from inventors and discoverers, such as Bacon, Galileo, Fulton, Stephenson, Columbus, Franklin, Morse, Bell, Edison and Marconi. Then remember the great artists, and the museums and academies where the treasures of their genius are inspiring millions to love of the beautiful, the true and the good. Other men have labored and we have entered into the fruit of their labors, for which we should praise Almighty God, from whom all blessings flow.

When the Church Derides Peace

IN an address on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of old St. Paul's Chapel in New York lately, the Rev. W. T. Manning, rector of Trinity parish, speaking before a distinguished audience, told of the part played by the old chapel in early American history. He contrasted it with the attitude of our country toward the European War today and challenged the nation's attitude as an unworthy one. We had not risen to our ideals. "We have perhaps been neutral," he said, "but in this hour of the world's emergency we have not been great." He added:

> It has not in the past been the way of America to sit indifferent to the struggle for justice and freedom anywhere. Our indifference to the principles at stake in this world crisis, our failure as a people to be moved by deep moral indignation at some of the deeds which have been committed, may well cause grave misgiving to those who love this land.
> The word "pacifism" has come much into vogue in recent time. If by pacifism is meant only a desire in every way possible to remove the causes and lessen the likelihood of war, then we are all in sympathy with it. But if by pacifism is meant the teaching that the use of force is never justifiable, then, however well meant, it is mistaken, and it is hurtful to the life of our country.

We have heard a good deal of this kind of talk lately, not a little of it from the pulpit. It is easy to rail at pacifism, and it is becoming something of a vogue to deride the pacifist and to hold up to scorn any one who professes adherence to the Christian principle that it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong, and that war is not only an evil, but is absolutely opposed to the teachings of Jesus Christ.

Rector Manning says: "The effort to identify the Christian religion with ultra-pacifism is a misapprehension of the truth and an injury to religion." We know of no such effort. It is true that the Christian religion does not enjoin us to leave our shores or our homes unprotected. Ultra-pacifism is not the teaching of the Gospel. The normal Christian attitude is that we should care for those dependent upon us and guard them against every danger. But there is a wide difference between this and the gospel of military and naval preparedness which so many of the churches have been urging in the most aggressive way. The logical result of the militant theology which such churches represent has been exemplified in the fate of Europe, where years of preparedness have already led to the sacrifice of millions of lives.

Too many of our ministers today are reading new interpretations into the teachings of Jesus Christ. He himself foretold great wars in the "latter days," but in no single utterance did he counsel his followers to join in the strife. This is made very clear in such passages as Matt. 24 : 13, Mark 13 : 7, and Luke 21 : 19. They were to keep their souls in patience while the world-struggle lasted. There is nowhere in the Gospels a single passage in which Christians are incited to join in those battles which were not of the Lord, but which sprang from the evil that was in the world. They were the outcome of the world's sin, of its forgetfulness of God and its rejection of Christ's teachings. And if the church or any portion of it at any time became involved in the fray, either by urging others to fight or by personal participation, it was unmistakably a departure from those teachings.

Jesus never intended that his church should be a fighting organization, save against the spiritual forces that are continually contesting for the mastery over men's souls. The church's true warfare is against the forces of darkness that would destroy the world, and to save men and bring them into peaceful relations with one another—not to urge them to slay each other.

We deny that there is any ultra-pacifism in this attitude. The true pacifist does not believe in dispensing with laws, with police, with sufficient protection against wicked and causeless aggression. But he trusts in the power of the Almighty to stand by him in the hour of danger, and to avert such perils as would be invited by an attitude of armed preparedness. Surely there is something that deserves to be commended rather than condemned in the attitude of a nation which is willing to put rightness before even greatness. "I would rather be right than be President," was the famous utterance of Henry Clay; and there are, let us say it with thankfulness, very many Americans who are of the same opinon today. It is unjust for any one, minister or layman, to decry this attitude on the part of men who have the courage to stand up for sound Christian doctrine, and who are not ashamed to be known as followers of the Prince of Peace. In the early days of the church it was exceedingly rare to find any professed Christian among the fighting men. They would lay down their lives gladly in defense of home or of kindred, but they would go joyfully to martyrdom rather than join in the wicked slaughter of men with whom they had no quarrel, as the fighting millions of Europe are doing today.

There is one other point in Rector Manning's address which deserves to be mentioned. "I believe," he said, "there is nothing that would be of such great practical benefit to us as universal military training for the men of our land. The assertion that this would lead us into militarism need not seriously be considered. . . . It will tend to make our young men better Americans, better citizens and better Christians." We must take exception to this remarkable conclusion. The whole spirit of Christianity is against such advice, which is all the more remarkable as having been given from one of the leading pulpits in America. To educate our youth in the art of war is one of the last suggestions that should come from the Christian minister. What would Christ himself have said of such teaching? Carried out to its extreme, not only this nation but all nations would be a series of armed camps, ready to spring at each other and slay. Australia, a democratic commonwealth, has just turned down the proposition for universal conscription. It has been the curse of Europe. We cannot think that our own fair land, were it even to be so transformed as to be invincible, could be any better or happier for such a startling innovation; and we thank God that, to the best of our belief, the great majority of the American people have the same conviction as ourselves.

Life's Lubricant

GOOD cheer is a great lubricant. It oils all of life's machinery.

"A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile—a."

Good cheer is a great producer. It adds wonderfully to one's active ability and increases mental and physical power. It makes hosts of friends and helps us to be interesting and agreeable.

Good cheer will attract more customers, sell more goods, do more business with less wear and tear than almost any other quality.

Optimism is the greatest business-getter, biggest trader, truest achiever in the world.

Pessimism has never done anything but tear down and destroy what optimism has built up.

In the business office, in society, in politics, in workshops, everywhere, the favorite is always the cheerful fellow with the bright smile and bright thoughts.

Good-natured, cheerful ones do not waste their vital energies as rapidly as the grumblers or the too sober, too sour ones do. They work and live with much less friction.

Good cheer is a simple habit. It is one of the best in all the list. CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

Erratic Theologians

OURS is an age of "new theologies," few of which, however, endure very long. It is only some ten years since the religious world was stirred by the publication, "The New Theology," by Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, in which that somewhat erratic though gifted minister expressed views concerning Christianity which, to say the least, were amazing. The book has already been forgotten, and the writer, after drifting from one denomination to another, has at last found a quiet though rather obscure anchorage in conservatism again. Another type of new theologian was "Pastor" Charles Taze Russell of Brooklyn, who recently died on a train in Texas. He disclaimed being the founder of a new religion. What he taught was the broadest universalism, with other features superadded which served to draw many to his standard. Within a decade he had an immense organization, with churches in a number of states and a pastorate that compelled him, in order to keep in personal touch with his constituency, to travel some 30,000 miles a year. He taught conditional immortality, the abolition of hell and its tortures, and the substitution of eternal death for eternal punishment. With a boldness in editing and interpreting the Scriptures which sprang largely from ignorance, the new theology of Russellism was so amazingly constructed that it never challenged the serious consideration of Bible authorities.

Then there were other features that gave a temporary piquancy to the new movement. The "miracle wheat" episode brought to light certain peculiarities of Russellism that were hardly calculated to commend it to thinking people. It was claimed f wheat, which was said to be evolved by some m process, that it assured wonderful crops to the f Pastor Russell's excursions into the doma prophecy were also a distinguishing trait of his Like many others who have assumed the diffic of prophetic interpretation, he came to grief o date on which the millennium was due, which for the fall of 1914—when the European War out instead! Would This Affect the Cost of Liv

A NOTED scientist has made a radical sta in regard to food. He says decidedly boldly, that flowers, as a steady diet, superior to the vegetables that we eat.

Perhaps he is right. Perhaps that is w average herbivorous animal is healthier th average man. Perhaps that is why cows have peaceful expression, why sheep look so con why elephants are so strong. For sheep and co elephants eat the grass and blossoms that grow the earth by natural instinct, while we, wh been educated past doing the instinctive thing for our food under ground.

Perhaps the scientist is right. Perhaps a violets and sweet lavender and geraniums is more healthy than a diet of sordid string bea potatoes and carrots. It will certainly save th housewife a great deal of extra trouble if he is It will be so much easier if the commuting hu who has a train to catch, learns to forego a breakfast, and eats, instead, a few buttercups p on his way to the station. It will be very sin send the children out into the fields to co dandelions when they ask for cookies.

Perhaps the scientist is right. Certainly it wo more than inspiring to sit down to a bowl of c roseleaves on a wonderful sunshiny June m One could write sonnets after such a breakfa would doubtless bring a great amount of cheer glowing golden chrysanthemums on a dull Nov afternoon at tea time. Food like that should forth at least an ode. It would indeed be ethereal to drink filtered dew from a cowslip cu

If the scientist is right, and if we in time bec flower-eating race, will we also become a r dreamers—of poets? Or will we be able to fly, hummingbirds and bees fly, because we have so long on honey and nectar and perfume th ground is far too solid for us to walk on? W world be a better, sweeter place to live in beca no longer eat—onions?

Is the scientist right? It is an open question.

Divine Companionship

MARK GUY PEARSE once said: "When a little lad of seven, I had gone to spend with some friends, three miles from my After a happy time in the hayfield, when the d done, I started for home. A muttering thunde was coming up in the distance. I was afrai stood against the old farmhouse door; I beg think I did not know the way home for thre miles. All the pictures I had ever looked at before me. There was Giant Pope in the Pil Progress, with eyes flashing lightning, waiting to come around the corner. There was Ap ready to spring upon me. All the robbers and I had ever heard of lay along those three miles. my heart sank within me! My knuckles scarcely keep back the tears. Just then, O joy leafy lane, there came my father! Thrifty Colored Servant

ARTHA R. GOHEN, a colored woman of Passaic, N. J., died the er day at the age of 82. She had health, loved hard work, had a level d for business, and out of her wages laid up $25,000 for a rainy day. She of a splendid character and was pected by the white people as well as those of her own race. She was a sistent Christian, and, having out- d her relatives, she left most of her ,000 to the church. While she has e to her reward in the other world, will continue the work of establish- Christ's kingdom to the end of time. r long life was one of service for others l her divine Master. The apostle ries in this servitude, using the cus- n of each master having a brand for slave as a symbol of Christ's brand ich he bears. He says, "I bear in body the marks of the Lord Jesus." (al. 6 : 17.)

Sir Joseph Beecham Dies

IR JOSEPH BEECHAM, the pill manufacturer, whose face and name familiar to the readers of newspapers all parts of the world, was found dead his bed in Hampstead, England. was in his sixty-ninth year. By the e of his pills the manufacturer rose m a farmer's boy to become a knight 1911, a baronet in 1914, and the third richest man in England, with a fortune estimated at over $140,000,000. He accomplished this by advertising, having been for a generation or more considered the greatest buyer of newspaper, billboard, and fence-rail space in the world. He advertised on every continent, including Greenland. His own picture usually accompanied the text recommending the pills. He started out a farm boy peddling the pills he had made, but soon learned that the newspaper and billposter could travel faster and farther, and sell more of his wares. He made his pills at the cost of a fraction of a cent a box, and sold the same for a shilling. After he had become one of the richest and probably the most widely known Englishman living, the pill manufacturer made liberal uses of his money, contributing to large philanthropies and backing popular causes. Between 1899 and 1912 he was three times elected mayor of St. Helens. They had not the printing press in Bible lands, and we have no record of large publicity schemes in business. But the art of publicity in important things was used. There is this mention of its use by the king of Nineveh, calling his people to penitence and reform: "And he caused it to be proclaimed and published throughout Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles." (Jonah 3 : 7.)

Saved to Useful Life

WHILE the National Druggists' Convention was being held in Baltimore recently, Mr. William H. Morris, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of that city, told an incident with reference to one of the most prominent and wealthy delegates to the convention. It is this: "Forty years ago there walked into the Friendly Inn connected with our Association a young man much the worse for the wear and tear of the struggle for existence. There was a sincerity about him which indicated better things. The managers of the Inn gave him every encouragement. He asked the privilege of going out to the kitchen fire to heat some material he seemed to be working upon, which was granted. After hanging around the Young Men's Christian Association Inn for some time he disappeared. That man is a prominent manufacturer, a millionaire, and one of the most influential citizens of Brooklyn. He is not ashamed of the time he slipped into the Young Men's Christian Association at Baltimore, and says it was his salvation from a lost opportunity. He says it was the turning-point of his life to good things for God and his fellow-men, and gives the Young Men's Christian Association credit for having saved him." It is this splendid spiritual influence and the hospitality extended to young men in the name of Christ that has made the Y. M. C. A. such a favored instrument in the hand of God. The hospitality extended to the down-and-out young man by the Friendly Inn of Baltimore calls to mind these words: "I was a stranger, and ye took me in." (Matt. 25 : 43.)

Episcopalians Oppose Saloon

AT the Protestant Episcopal Convention at St. Louis on October 24, the Deputies asked the House of Bishops to concur in the following resolution: "Whereas, Our age is witnessing vast and universal readjustment with reference to the manufacture and sale of liquor, and it is generally recognized that the saloon has become more and more a menace to the best interests of our corporate and industrial life, therefore, be it resolved, the House of Bishops concurring, that this church places itself on record as favoring such action in our legislative assemblies as will preserve the large interests of temperance and will aid in the repression of the liquor traffic." This is an advanced step by the Episcopalians, and will rejoice anti-saloon people all over the country. This thought is contained in the resolution: "Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good." (Rom. 12 : 9.)

Ice Substitute Found

A SUBSTITUTE for refrigerators with ice in them has been discovered by an inventive Dane, namely, boxes cooled by water. His invention has proven so popular that in all the newer sections of Copenhagen the apartment houses are constructed with reference to the new feature. The iceless refrigerator is accomplished by so constructing the piping in the house that all the cold water is conducted through pipes at the rear of the box. Since a great deal of cold water is drawn in the course of a day, the refrigerators stay fresh and cool. If this invention proves to be what it promises, it will have general use throughout the world, as ice, which used to be counted a luxury, is now a necessity, and the price of ice is often so high as to be out of the reach of many. The name of the Dane was not mentioned in the telegram from Copenhagen, but if his plan of refrigeration works as he expects, his praises will be sung around the earth. Ice is mentioned but little in the Scriptures. One such reference is, "He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold?" (Ps. 147 : 17.)

A Unique Pulpit

AS the church bells were calling the people of Elgin, Ill., to worship smoke and flame burst from the Episcopal Church of the Redeemer. By the time the engines arrived an excited volunteer brigade was rushing the valuable appointments of the church to safety. The blaze was not suppressed till the organ had been destroyed. The Rev. James Madison Johnson, rector, made an impromptu pulpit of the front steps and held a twenty-minute service in the open air after the fire had been extinguished. All the other Protestant churches in Elgin immediately offered their chapels for the burned-out congregation to hold services at night. The damage was covered by insurance. What a lovely spirit of fraternity was manifested by the various churches of Elgin! How brave and sensible a thing for the pastor to hold his audience at the scene of the conflagration to worship God and make new vows for faithful service in the future! The fires can lick up the material house in which the congregation worships, but not the things for which they stand. The real church, the spiritual one, is built on Christ, the foundation, and is proof against the fires of time and eternity. The apostle in commenting on the permanency of the church says: "Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is." (I Cor. 3 : 13.)

A Rembrandt Brings $250,000

HENRY C. FRICK has purchased for $250,000 another painting by Rembrandt, "An Old Woman Reflecting After Reading." The painting has been for nearly fifty years in the collection of M. Jules Porges of Paris. It is understood that the collection of 104 pictures at Mr. Frick's New York residence is designed to be the finest private art collection in America, and that it will one day be given to the city of New York. Before the purchase of the last picture, Mr. Frick's collection contained three other Rembrandts, "The Polish Rider," painted in 1659; "The Portrait of Rembrandt," painted in 1658; and "The Portrait of an Artist," painted in 1655. "The Old Woman Reflecting After Reading" is dated 1649. The canvas is 38½ inches high and 31 inches wide. The subject is a very old woman whose face has been wrinkled into a thousand lines. She wears a red headgear, a brownish dress, a piece of brown fur about her shoulders, and a golden collar. Rembrandt Harmens van Rhyn, the crowning glory of the Dutch school of painters, son of a miller, was born in a house on the bank of the Rhine at Leyden. His 360 etchings served almost as much as his paintings to place his reputation high. His power and originality are exemplified in almost every branch of art, and as examples of composition, expression, color and light and shade his works rank with those of the greatest artists of the world. If Rembrandt had only had one-tenth of the money Mr. Frick paid for one of his pictures he might have enjoyed a comfortable old age instead of being dragged like so many artists and authors into bankruptcy, and soon after into the grave. His life of singular unselfishness and usefulness was snuffed out at about sixty in a desperate effort to extricate himself from financial embarrassments. It makes no difference now. Rembrandt is immortal as to his earthly fame, his influence on the best thought and sentiment of the ages. God is Absolute Beauty, and Rembrandt and the other great artists are reflections of that beauty. The divine beauty is thus referred to: "That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord." (Ps. 27 : 4.)

The Wicked John Goode

An Autobiography Transcribed by HORACE WINTHROP SCANDLIN

AT this place I came under Superintendent Blackstone. Here I found the food was quite a bit better than at Palmer, but outside of that I had stepped from the frying-pan into the fire, or even worse. It was an institution of incorrigibles! They said so themselves! They admitted that each inmate was a hopeless case, so why question it? Why try and find even one soul among them who wasn't? What was the use of trying to make them better boys? You wouldn't treat a dog one-half as badly as they treated us. You'd be afraid the dog would spring at you and tear you to pieces. And the dog would, too, if it got the chance, and no onlooker would blame the animal. They had the school at Palmer resembling a kindergarten by comparison. If you fell asleep in church, you got three or four days in a dungeon on a scant measure of bread and water once in twenty-four hours. These dungeons were dark, damp holes in the cellar, without a bed or mattress. Sometimes you got a board to sleep on. There were no toilets.

If an instructor or a guard smashed you in the face and floored you, and you happened to crawl to your feet sooner than was expected, you got a second smash or a vicious kick. Then after that you lay still!

I went through all this! I went through it at a time in my life when a boy's character is most easily swayed and bent and molded into something very difficult to change as year follows year.

However, I had broken laws. I was a thief and I should be punished. The fact that I was only a young lad (as were all the inmates) didn't seem to make any difference as to the kind of punishment they handed out.

Blackstone soon discovered that his brutal treatment had but one effect on me. It increased my viciousness and wickedness, and so again I was bound out to serve a new master. This time it was to a young farmer, whose name I can't recall. The exact location, too, I've forgotten, although I remember it was a small village on the border between Maine and New Hampshire.

The night of my arrival he met me at the train, assumed responsibility for me, and away we went. We sat up nearly all night in front of a big log fire and talked. He asked me a thousand and one questions about myself and about the jails I'd been in. He called them jails, but the state called them reform schools. I told him all he wanted to know and more. Without realizing it I frightened him so badly that when at last I went to bed he sat down and wrote the authorities at Deer Island to come and get me, which they did; and so I didn't become a farmer.

Back at Deer Island among the incorrigibles, myself one of them! Back in the dungeon! Unconscious on the floor—knocked there by a paid servant of the law! And me a young boy!

They simply couldn't stand for me—that was all there was to it. They must get rid of me. This time they bound me over to the Sanborn and Boardman Company, of Newburyport, Mass., the owners of the good ship Hiawatha, a two-master in the cod-fishing industry plying between Newburyport and Labrador. For them I was to make one voyage and need not return to the Home at Deer Island.

And so for the last time I left a reformatory—re-form—a place where a boy's habits, character and thoughts are supposed to be made over again—new and fresh and good.

Perhaps they did try!

Perhaps the fault was all mine!

I knew little enough of good the first time I went to a reformatory, but I knew everything that was wrong when I left my last one!

When I was forty-six years old, after my last prison term, I didn't know a bit more wrong than I had been taught or had gathered in reform schools. I simply had had more experience, that's all.

When I stood, unashamed, before Judge Cowing to receive a sentence that was to take me to Sing Sing Prison he said to me in effect, "John Goode, your name should have been John Bad. You've broken every trust ever laid on you. You were paid to uphold the law; you were a policeman; and yet you've broken the law time and time again. You're a bad man. I wish I might give you a longer sentence. You deserve it."

Yes, he was right. But he didn't go far enough, that's all. He might, and I think he should, have told the crowd of morbid people who were eagerly listening, that I had received my criminal education in reform schools; that I was a product of the then method of handling bad boys.

CHAPTER VII

ON BOARD SHIP—BOUND OUT

THE night before the schooner sailed, I was delivered to the skipper and locked in a top floor room of his house, with the grown daughter of the family on guard outside.

I was to sail in the morning on that ship—that abiding-place of the devil. I figured that anything was better than the place I had left, so I lay down and went to sleep.

Never so long as I live will I forget the scene on the wharf at sailing time. I, alone, of all who sailed, walked aboard the vessel. Some crawled aboard, others were carried aboard, and the rest were thrown aboard. Each man had a skin full of booze. It had been their last night ashore for six months to come. As we were to be towed out of the harbor and sail up the coast light, there was no last-minute loading or work to do, and the men made the most of their time in the neighboring shock houses.

And thus we sailed! At the time it made no great impression on me, because that's about all I'd ever seen. But now, as I look back at it, I sicken. You know what the voyage must have been. You've seen both sides of life. Fourteen men with little to do on the run up, more than enough to do while fishing, and little to do on the run down. Away from civilization, away from booze—ungovernable tempers—vilest of tongues!

I needn't tell you how I was mistreated and abused and struck. I won't tell you why I was kicked bodily down into the hold of that vessel, among thousands of dead fish, the man who did it not knowing whether I was dead or alive and not caring! The point is, I lived through it and in six months' time was back home. Home! What a word for me to use about myself.

The Miracle

SOMEWHERE I've read a story of a man
  Who lived a life so holy that there came
From heaven an angel, begging him to ask
  The gift of miracles; to heal the lame

Or touch with light the blind. The saint replied,
  "God should do that. If to the palsied limb,
Or stricken sight, I brought the healing power,
  The glory might be given me—not him."

"And what, then, do you most of all desire?
  What may I from the heavenly Father bring?"
"I only ask that he will give me grace,
  And, having that, I shall have everything."

"But you must ask some miracle, dear saint!"
  The angel, with a sweet persistence, cried.
"Then let it be that I shall do much good,
  And know it not," the humble saint replied.

And so this was the miracle: Whene'er
  He could not see the shadow which he threw,
It had the power to comfort, bless, and heal,
  But all the good it did he never knew.

And thus he simply went along his path,
  Diffusing wondrous fragrance, like the flower
That sheds abroad sweet perfume, or the star
  That cheers by night, unconscious of its power.

Ah! he whose life is wholly lived for Christ,
  Who walks unswervingly the pilgrim way,
Knows not the half of all the good he does,
  Until the great revealing Judgment Day!

A. M. G.

I need not go back to the reformatory, for they were through with me. They had reformed me—the great state of Massachusetts virtually said so in releasing me. And furthermore, had they not found a place for me where I could prove my fitness and prove myself a good boy? Had they not bound me out to the skipper of the good ship Hiawatha? Surely they had done enough! Had they not left my body covered with marks where they had beaten me, to teach me the difference between right and wrong? What more could any reasonable boy expect? Yes, I was free! And so out again I went, alone, to face the world—to buck and beat the tides of fortune.

CHAPTER VIII

IN WHICH I MEET MY AUNT

THE old desire to go to my mother's sister again came over me, and at once I was on my way. Well do I remember arriving at her house. And how shy I felt and how I hesitated about entering! Vel do I remember how glad she was to see me, ho she cried and hugged and kissed me on learning wh the big, raw lad in front of her was.

How strange it seemed! How awkward I elt How I shrank from her caresses! It was more ıar I could understand. Other women and girls ıad kissed me. But not because they were glad t see me. Not because they had learned who I vas Why did she? I know now. She loved me. it didn't know then.

I had no sooner arrived than I began to get u sy I remained with her only a few hours. The mi seemed to suffocate me and the thought of rema ing inactive, and in such small quarters, sickened

At noontime my aunt put a good big hot m l in front of me. It was then that I told her I mu be going on my way. One of the fishermen had old me about Philadelphia, and I had decided to go ere My aunt gave me five or six dollars—all she h l in the house. As I was leaving I remember her lo ing at my feet and all that remained of the boots wa wearing tied to my feet with coarse string. She called me back, and taking off her own shoes ave them to me, and I was off!

I made Philadelphia on the trucks in four ys Part of my money I spent on clothing, of which wa in sore need.

What a strange thing it is! How easily like ee like in this world, ofttimes with little or no ort Immediately I ran into a gang of men who had oy stealing for them both in the city and on the ad and as I knew that well and nothing e , had no difficulty in securing a job, and o the road I went.

You probably wonder how it was that ost of the people I met were thieves working ng of boys. Wouldn't it have been str ge otherwise? I was riding freights m tly Such men, in those days, made their adquarters in or near railroad yards, and hey were on the lookout for boys. I was a oy They knew the type of lad I represente It didn't take long to get wise, for we didn' alk weather, politics or foreign exploration.

CHAPTER IX

NOW A PROFESSIONAL THIEF

IN exactly the same way that I beat my vay East as an eleven-year-old boy, I no retraced my steps and beat my way West ar experienced and expert criminal. I can tell you how it was that gambling got so str g a hold on me. I had always gambled, eve s a small boy; but the habit grew on me ra dly now, as all evil habits do, until all at o e I realized that I was its slave—I was comp ely in its grip. So badly had I the habit th instead of stealing because stealing sat fied me, I found I was stealing in order that I ght have means with which to satisfy my sire for chance—for the table, the cards an the horses.

By this time I must confess I knew full the wrong in the life I was leading. I was ow beyond fifteen, and ignorance could excu me no longer. My powers of observation ere naturally keen, and the training they ad received had not dulled them any. I had suddenly realized that the side of the fe e I had chosen for my path through life wa the crooked one.

I began to think about it. I began to w der about people and about things. This was mething I'd never done before. It proved m hty interesting. The people I thought out and the things I thought about were the only ple and the only things I knew. I couldn't get o ide of my environment, and so I didn't change. nd I know lots of people today who ought to get o ide of their present environment, but who can't.

I knew the biggest gamblers between New ork and Chicago, and frequented their places. I new the most daring yeggmen—the most skilful d s— the whole profession, in fact. And so, when I gan to think about people, those were the people I th ght about. I knew these people were doing dish est and unlawful things, and so when I began to ink about things those were the things I thought a out. Like thousands and thousands of other folks, did all my thinking along the lines of least resistance Heretofore, most of my stealing had been do because I needed something—food, clothes. Now, owever, came the big change. I began to steal as a usiness, as a profession. And at fifteen, then, I had be me a professional thief. That means one who wil gly accepts such work as a means of accomplishing hat which has domination over him; and as the desi for gambling dominated all else in me, I became a p fessional thief that I might gamble with the procee

"On the First Day of the Week . . ."

THERE are fifty-two of them in the year, as against 313 days devoted to work and worry and a dash of play. These fifty-two days are expected to provide an antidote to our work play weariness. When we stop to consider seri- y what we are most weary of, we shall undoubtedly that it is ourselves. Intentionally or unintention- consciously or unconsciously, we are constantly king of ourselves. The Sabbath is intended as an ortunity to forget ourselves by purposely thinking thers. Thinking of God chiefly, and that includes king of his children. Of se, we can think of his trees, mines, oceans, stars, but we 't understand such things half vell as we understand human gs. And Paul advised the inthians, in their considera- of the poor, to select the first of the week as a time for ng by in store as God had spered, for the relief of the rosperous.

; would be a marvelous ievement absolutely to forget selves from the beginning to ending of the first day of every k. We would probably forget ver a great many annoyances troubles and fears and aches pains and impending disasters t now dog our every step. But tly better than that, we would a right use of the time, or a tion of the time, become uainted with the real troubles many other people and find se opportunities of service which we sigh.

Vhy should not every Christian 'ship God on the first day of week by thinking for a while on the sufferings of that count- number of his children who so appallingly afflicted by the rse of the war in Europe?

Have you read that something 14,000,000 human beings are believed to have ished in Poland alone, as a result of the surging k and forth of those great armies of madmen?

Have you read that the remaining nine or ten mil- of Poland's former population are for the most t paupers? Can you conceive of anything so hor- le as a whole population reduced to pauperism? n you conceive of what it means to be able to turn where for help because on every hand the direst verty prevails?

Have you read that among the Armenian people re remains scarcely one complete family? Can u consider without emotion a whole race torn up by roots from its native soil, stripped of its choicest possessions as you would strip a tomato vine, and cast, as you would cast that useless plant, into the refuse? The Armenians have been ruthlessly uprooted, driven from their homes, despoiled of their manhood and young womanhood and left to wander from place to place, outcasts, starving and dying.

Inasmuch as these fearful tales are told us by the most trustworthy observers, how can we close our ears or shut our eyes or harden our hearts to them? Dare we refuse to consider these helpless sufferers, and refuse to lay by for their relief as God has prospered us?

Why not think about these and thousands upon thousands like them and even far worse off, this coming first day of the week, and plan to hold up the hands of the men and women who are trying to save them from becoming outcasts? Or don't you care?

It is cause for rejoicing that so many of the Christian Herald Family are contributing as much and as often as they can to the fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War. It is distressing beyond any words to think of our committees, in the midst of most woeful need, seeing the pitiful faces and hearing the heart-rending cries, yet powerless to do more than save one life here and one life there, and one family, perhaps, relieving but a fraction of the misery, and striving to keep up hope in others by assurances of help to come.

We are hoping that a continuous stream of help will be available for every committee through the medium of the Monthly Offering Clubs which we have announced in connection with this relief work. Let us repeat here that it is not our intention to make a distinction between those who contribute frequently or even but once to this work, and those who contribute regularly. This is a matter of which we cannot judge. The single gift, never repeated, may truly be as acceptable in the sight of God as a munificent gift month after month. You are to decide for yourselves how best to do your part in this great work. And yet we urge you all to consider enlisting in one or the other of the Monthly Offering Clubs, even though the amount may be small. This is in accordance with the Scriptural plan and with Paul's injunction about laying by for the poor on the first day of the week. We have made the period monthly as a convenience in remitting, but of course the practice of putting aside something for this purpose each week should be followed, and once a month the amount you wish to contribute can be sent.

Monthly Offering Club No. 1, donors of fifty cents monthly; No. 2, donors of one dollar monthly; No. 3, donors of two dollars monthly; No. 4, donors of three dollars monthly; No. 5, donors of five dollars monthly; No. 6, donors of ten dollars monthly; No. 7, donors of twenty dollars monthly; No. 8, donors of twenty-five dollars monthly; No. 9, donors of fifty dollars monthly; No. 10, donors of some amount monthly, determined by circumstances each month.

WE wish to say again also that while we are emphasizing the positively unparalleled need in Europe, your gifts through the Monthly Offering Clubs will be apportioned in accordance with your expressed wish, and can as readily be applied to other benevolent work as though you sent your gifts specifically for such other work. Our wish is to enlist all our readers in one or another of these Monthly Offering Clubs for the regular distribution of such charitable gifts as you wish the Christian Herald to administer for you.

Why not give this whole subject a very definite place on the approaching first day of the week, and settle, each in your own family circle, just what you will undertake to do and which of these clubs you will enter? Please let us hear from you. Address the Treasurer of the Monthly Offering Club, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Wiring New York for Billy Sunday

THE many varied activities preceding a "Sunday campaign" in any city are now beginning to get well under way in New York. Headquarters for the campaign have been opened in the Metropolitan Tower, and George Sunday, the evangelist's eldest son, came during the closing days of October to begin the work of organization and preparation.

In some respects the launching of a Sunday campaign in New York has presented greater difficulties—or rather more peculiar difficulties—than are usually met in other cities. The first and most troublesome question was that of location. No building could be found suited in all respects for the meetings. The only vacant lots which seemed at all desirable for the erection of a tabernacle belonged to the city. So very strictly is New York's charter drawn that no property owned by the city can be diverted even temporarily from its designated purpose, and no such arrangement could be made as that in Philadelphia, where the lot intended for the new Public Library was secured for the Sunday tabernacle.

At last, however, a site on the upper West Side easy of access by the subway has been selected. A tabernacle to seat 20,000 persons will be erected on the chosen lot at a cost of about $20,000.

Another most perplexing problem was the choice of a chairman for the executive committee. The fact that Mr. Sunday is really coming to New York and that the campaign is really to occur is in itself proof that the selection of Mr. James M. Speers as chairman was a wise one. Mr. Speers has the reputation of being the kind of man who recognizes no obstacles. When Mr. Sunday said No to the committee's invitation to come to New York, Mr. Speers merely closed his lips together a little more firmly and went right on. And Mr. Sunday is coming. And the campaign is to last all through April, May, and June of 1917, a month longer than any previous campaign.

Supplementing and reinforcing the executive committee of twenty-five is a general committee of one hundred, one-half of whom are ministers and one-half laymen. Fifteen local committees are being arranged: finance, building, prayer, personal work, ushers, hospital, transportation, shop work, entertainment, junior work, students' work, music, business women, central committee and extension committee. Twelve thousand singers will form the chorus, there will be three to four thousand ushers, and six hundred secretaries will register names of inquirers and others at the meetings. The value of definite registration in all details has just been cited by George Sunday, who from tabulating figures of the past three years, now states that out of the number of converts giving their names and designating their preference for individual churches, eighty-seven per cent. are now identified with those churches; of those who designated only the denomination preferred, sixty-four per cent., while only thirty-one per cent. of those who were not immediately tied up to some church ever became identified.

James M. Speers, Chairman

Executive Committee, New York Sunday Campaign

As in other cities the campaign expenses will be underwritten. There is to be a sufficient guarantee fund. Collections will be taken at the meetings so that all attending may feel they have a share in contributing to the campaign, yet New York promises to be so gracious in its welcome to Mr. Sunday that money-giving at the servic wil not have to be unduly stressed.

Billy Sunday is reported to hav aid "We might get somebody to p m $1,000,000 to build a temple tha wil hold 20,000 people, but we would uc rather have 1,000,000 people come ros with $1 each."

The campaign was brought ab t i a spirit of prayer, because of p yer Prayer circles already have been fc ied and five thousand prayer meetin ar to be held twice a week, with from 00 to 5,000 definitely assigned church em bers in charge. The Sunday com tte will try the plan of establishing, fa as it may be found possible, a aye meeting in each residence block.

The Methodists and Presbyt ian as denominational bodies have pl ge their support. A dozen leading E sco palian rectors are standing solidly th movement, and 10,000 members thi denomination may be depended fo cooperation. Many leaders, bot la and clerical, of other denominatio ar also active in the work of prepari fo the campaign. There is some oppo ion but it is not active. The consen s o opposing judgment seems to be: Th Lord has blessed Billy Sunday's l ers and we would not dare to put an ol ach in the way of his coming here; vei while we do not believe in Mr. Sui ay' methods, we do believe in his ris tianity."

Wild Stories from the Wilds of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

"THE winter is coming and Monte Terrill will have to go to jail that the public may be able to take care of him."

This remark gives in a nutshell one of the strange conditions that obtain in the heart of Alaska. This country has no accommodations for vagrants and no laws for the needy poor. It has one Pioneer Home, but that is at Sitka, on Baranof Island, about 2,000 miles from where Monte lives.

Monte Terrill is a character. His whole life has been a fight against misfortune, and now, although blind and lame, he is not willing to give up the battle. I do not know his age, but he has long passed three score and ten. Years ago, when he first came to the Klondike, he was one of the most ambitious, determined and industrious of the sourdoughs. He underwent all sorts of hardships, and one day when out trapping sank through some rotten ice he attempted to cross and was wet to the waist. The thermometer was twenty-five degrees below zero and his feet were frozen to such an extent that one had to be amputated at the ankle, and the other taken off half way to the knee. He had a pair of artificial feet made, and with them again took up the battle of life. He got about so well on his wooden pins that but few knew of his troubles, and he succeeded in obtaining a job with a gang working on the Copper River Railroad. At that time he was quartered with a number of other men in a bunkhouse. He did not want his state known for fear he would lose his position. But one night when in his bunk, having taken off his false feet and laid them beside him, the string attached to one of them hung down and tickled the man in the bunk below. The man was a mean fellow, and he reported Monte's condition to the boss, and as a result he was dismissed.

After that Monte worked at anything he could get, drifting from camp to camp. Finally he settled in a cabin on the River Cheena not far from Fairbanks, where he cut wood for the steamers. For several years he earned his living in that way. Then his eyesight failed, and it was pitiful to see how he tried to keep the people from knowing his misfortune. When he heard a man coming he would straighten up and start to walk about boldly, often running into a tree or a fence. He was offered assistance, but would not take it. Last year he was known to be suffering for lack of food and was arrested on a charge of vagrancy and sentenced to jail for the winter. This was in order that the citizens might have a legal right to take care of him. Even then he complained, saying he wanted to go back to his cabin, and that he knew he could in some way earn enough to care for himself.

Alaska's only Pioneer Home, located at Sitka

The above story was told me by Mr. L. T. Erwin, who is now chief of police and United States marshal at Fairbanks. "Judge" Erwin came originally from a little town in Georgia, being born on the same street as Sam Jones. It is related that Sam Jones was eight years old at the time, and that he was anxious to see the new baby. When it was shown him, he remarked: "Oh, my, ain't he red!"

Well, Marshal Erwin is still red, and he has a red-hot job in Alaska. He has to keep order in a district half again as large as either Germany or France, and he does this with the aid of a large number of deputies. In the number of assistants employed, he tells me, his marshalship is second among the districts of the United States. The first is southern New York state, including New York city and Brooklyn. Its population is millions, and the marshal there has twenty-six deputies, who aid him in spending the $265,000 required for his duties. The second is this part of Alaska. The district has only twenty thousand population, but these are so scattered that twenty deputies are required to watch over them, and the annual expenses are $235,000. The amount per capita is high, but as to area it is not a dollar per square mile. The deputies are scattered over the whole country running from the Canadian boundary near Eagle to the Russian mission on the Lower Yukon and from the Arctic circle to the edge of the Kuskokwim region.

I have already written how well the mounted police keep order in the Yukon Territory adjoining Alaska Its men have the right to arrest crin als, investigate crimes and settle dis ites on the ground. Here in Alask the marshals and their deputies ha to refer almost everything to Washi ton before they can act. When a cri e is committed, not a cent can be sp to detect the criminal without auth rity from the Attorney General, five six thousand miles away. The othe day a terrible murder was committe just outside the city. No one knew who was the murderer, and it was imp ant to scour the neighborhood and gin the work of investigation at ice. Before he could proceed, the ma hal had to send this cable to Washir on:

Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

Woman foully murdered last night ong the railroad track within five miles of air-banks. Authority requested to pay ex nses of office deputies and make investigati s in the surrounding country.

[Signed]

UNITED STATES MARS L.

After some days the reply to go ead came and the marshal got the m ey. In the Yukon Territory the mo ted police would have been on the jol nd the arrest made almost immediat .

I went with Marshal Erwin th gh the jail in Fairbanks. The crin als are kept in cages of iron, so arr ged that they can be seen on all les. There were nine in the cells at the me of my visit.

I asked the marshal as to the me of this part of Alaska. He repli :

"The territory is supposed to b full of bad men, but that is a mistak I have lived in this district for e en years, and during that time only one man has been killed with a p tol. There are but few people in the cou try who carry weapons, either open or concealed. The murders that ve been committed have been with ns, clubs, or knives. During my ter of three years as marshal there have en only two murders in my whole dist t."

"Have you the typical bad man ho now and then comes in and shoo up the town?"

"No. I have been in Alaska eig en years and have never heard of ch a case. Our people are law-abi ng, and in that respect they stand as gh as any people of the world. Bur ry lmost unknown. I lived in Fair- ks eight years before I locked my r. The people will not stand for beries. We have our strikes, but e is no bloodshed and no destruc- of property.

The people are charitable. They n spend $500 or more to send a man away to Seattle, and they ays give a little money to keep man until he gets on his feet. an instance of the generosity of rbanks take the San Francisco hquake. The news of it was graphed here one Saturday. re was a meeting that night at gle Hall and by noon the next $20,000 had been collected and ted on its way to the sufferers. nonth later there was a fire in rbanks and almost the whole n was burned. The people side remembered what we had ie for San Francisco, and offers help poured in. They were all ised, the mayor sending this ssage: 'We thank you all, but can carry our own skillet and 't need any help.'" is surprising that there is not more crime in Fairbanks. The is in the heart of the wilds, it is surrounded by mining nps that have produced about 000,000 worth of gold dust and ggets. At times the banks have n loaded with gold, and every np has its bags of gold which washed out at every clean-up. ld is kept in cans and other nmon receptacles in the log ins, and I have not yet seen a use that could not be easily ken into and robbed. Millions dollars' worth of gold is annually ried out on the steamers that go wn the Tanana and up the Yukon White Horse. The present thod of transporting this treasure is old-fashioned iron safe which has ndles on each side. The safe is left t in the open under the deck, the ndles being chained to the mast.

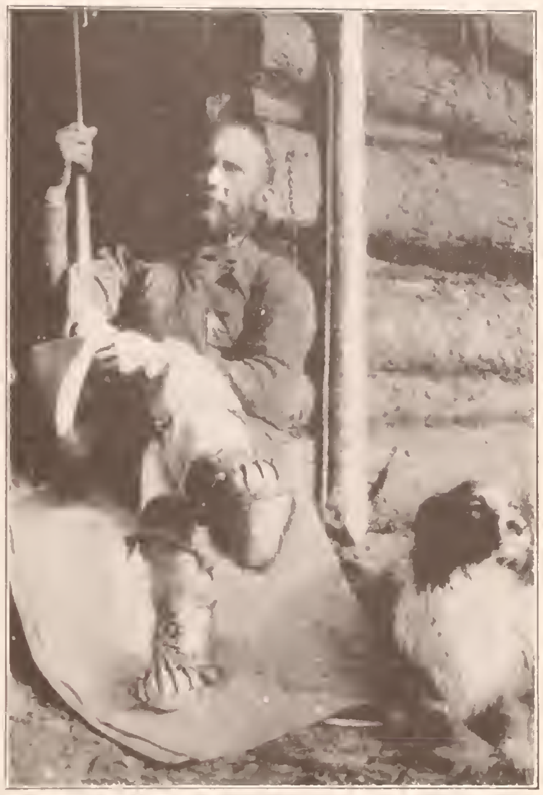
In the past the gold was kept in a ong room, and now and then thefts re attempted. One day a sailor un- ewed the bars of the room and got t a box of dust and nuggets worth 3,000. He had a partner in the crime. ie two men tied a rope to the box d fastened a life preserver to the her end of the rope. They then rew the box overboard, thinking the e preserver would act as a float and able them to find the box when they me back later on. They also marked ith their eye the place where it fell. t the next stopping of the steamer ie of the men dropped into the water id swam to the bank. He went back the river and looked for the gold it could not find it. A little later the ficers of the steamer found that the rong room had been tampered with, id that one of the boxes was missing. hey caught the criminals and took iem to Fairbanks. They were tried id sent to the penitentiary. The life reserver was afterward found by an Indian. The box of gold is still in the Yukon.

At another time, about ten years ago, a man planned to rob a steamer of one of the big gold shipments and came from the outside to do it. He got a job as night watchman on the steamer and learned just how the gold was handled. One night he broke into the strong room and took out two boxes, each of which contained $60,000 in gold dust. He pried open one of the boxes and removed $40,000 worth of the gold, and in its place put about the same amount of buckshot, which he had procured at the stores of Fairbanks for the purpose. He did not buy the shot himself, but sent some men from the steamer for it, pretending that he wanted it for hunting. After closing and fastening the box he carried it back and laid it down on the deck beside the other box which he had taken out. It was lighter than the box which had nothing but gold, but he expected to put the two boxes back into the strong room. Before he was able to do so, however, two drunken men came aboard. They stumbled over the gold chests and realized what they were. They concluded to steal one, and picked up the lightest, in which was the shot, and dropped it over the side of the vessel. Later on they got it out and buried it in the woods. All this happened that night and while they were half drunk. After burying the gold they went to sleep. The next morning one of them grew frightened at what he had done and told the agent of the steamship company about it, offering to show him where the gold was. In the meantime the loss had been discovered by the men on the steamer. They came ashore and went with the agent to the woods and found the box. They opened it, and lo, it was two-thirds full of shot. It was then remembered that a man had been buying shot and he was arrested. He denied having stolen the gold, but was convicted and sent to the penitentiary.



This miner won't catch cold in his bear feet, for they are only tied on THESE stories are vouched for by the people of Fairbanks, but I am beginning to doubt whether all the stories I hear in Alaska are true. I have just been told one about a miner at White River who had his toes frozen so that his feet sloughed off to the instep. The story is that the man had the toes amputated and was able to walk on the stubs with the aid of a pair of bear's feet made into moccasins, the bear's claws taking the place of his toes. The man who told me this showed me a photograph of the miner with his bear feet tied on.

Another extravagant story is a zoological one. The people here say that Alaska is as free of snakes as was Ireland after the advent of St. Patrick. They say that the only snake that ever came into the territory was one brought from the outside in a bale of timothy hay. This occurred about two years ago. As the story goes, the snake arrived on the edge of the winter and crawled out of the bale when the thermometer was about 40 degrees below zero. It immediately froze solid, and as it lay there was found by an Indian chief. It was a long snake, and the head had bent over so that it looked like a cane. The chief used it as a cane all that winter, and he is said to be using it still. He buries it in the prehistoric ice under the moss as the spring comes on, and when the thermometer falls brings it out as a prop to keep him from falling.

And then the fish stories. Judge Wickersham, the Alaskan delegate to Congress, who lives at Fairbanks, tells me of a lake near the headwaters of the Tanana River where he often goes for sport in the summer. The water is as clear as crystal, and looking down over the side of the boat he can see hundreds of fish swimming about. He picks out the fishes he wishes to catch, dropping his bait in front of only the best, and pulling it away when a small fish or one of the wrong variety might swallow it. As I remember, he could catch a boat load in an hour, but on account of this careful selection and his desire for sport it takes longer.

It is said also that when the women of Fairbanks go fishing, instead of dropping the flies on the water, they hold them at the end of the line, some distance above it, and guess as to who can make the trout jump the highest.

The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

OW can I do my part as husband and father to keep family worship at the high vel at which it ought to be kept? And hat plan of Bible reading do you recommend family worship—the reading of selected ssages, or the reading of a book throughout? If in my few minutes of private devotion I egin to read a book through in a series of ort passages, I am soon discouraged by the eling that I do not half understand the real gnificance of what I read. This brings me ack to the idea that the Bible ought to be udied. Yet this does not seem practicable fifteen minutes at the close of a busy day.

YOU are right in maintaining the godly old custom of family worship. There are many books of ome prayers, but I would hardly recom- nend this resource. Printed prayers, owever beautifully they may be hrased, are necessarily unsatisfying. They miss the essential purpose of amily worship, which is to lay before he mercy-seat the peculiar needs of ne's own home and the pressing de- ires of one's own heart. You should ave no difficulty. Just think of your own domestic concerns, and lay these simply and lovingly and believingly before the heavenly Father. Where there are children there is no lack of material for prayer. I like the old fashion of naming each child, and asking a special blessing for each, and commending each to the Saviour's grace. Just open your heart and utter simply and lovingly what is in it. And always conclude your prayer with the united repetition of "Our Father." As for the reading, it is best, as a rule, to read through a book, thus following the sacred narrative. Most churches provide daily readings, and you would probably do well to adopt your church's prescription. It makes family worship a "communion of saints."

The Scriptures are profitable only as they are understood, and it is hardly possible for a busy man, occupied all day long with his duties in the world, to engage in a technical study of them, even if he had the requisite scholarship. A book of Scripture becomes luminous when one knows its historic background and perceives the course of its argument. Thus, Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians is the most vivid and dramatic of his writings; yet there is none less generally intelligible. What, for instance, does the average reader make of the impassioned discussions about women praying with uncovered heads or about speaking with tongues? These and other obscure passages kindle with tingling, bounding animation the moment one perceives their purpose—the situation of the Corinthian church, the controversies which rent it, the scandals which disgraced it. Once the hidden drama has been unfolded the Epistle is a living thing, and every sentence is eloquent. And the unfolding of it is a preacher's business. Men hunger, consciously or unconsciously, for God, and this is the reason why they turn so gladly to a teacher who is able to interpret these.

A Living Sacrifice

International Sunday School Lesson for November 26
Romans 12

The Christian Characteristics

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE might wonder how it happened that the International Committee selected this lesson, for after completing Paul's career we go back to the letter he wrote to the Romans from Corinth long before. Yet this book is the classic Pauline letter. Its first part gives Paul's theology fully, its second part his practical teachings. Our study this week is thoroughly practical. And Paul's life exemplified the qualities we find here in a marked degree. Some of our students will be interested in finding an occasion in Paul's ministry which fits each verse of this chapter. "Twelfth of Romans" should bo part of our own personal, assimilated "little Bible", (as Luther called it)—that which is memorized, meditated upon, become part of our souls. It is given to us in our study as a type of Christian teaching in the early days. How new and fascinating and powerful it must have been! Yet it has that power now wherever really apprehended and lived out.

The Dedicated Life

PAUL pleads with the Romans—and with us—for a dedicated life, laid before the White Throne of God. Not a mutilated, bleeding sacrifice of dead things, but the beautiful, symmetrical, continuous consecration of our redeemed personalities, fitting our minds and our bodies to be the worthiest possible for such a daily service. The lamb that was offered on the primitive altar was "without blemish, spotless, white." The bullocks of David were in the prime of strength. To us these become symbolic of the sincere conscience, without offense, and the full-orbed talents, unhandicapped, which we ought to present.

Let me show you just what I have in mind. Not long ago a young man came within the influence of a devout family in our church. He felt the call of Christ through the church and was soundly converted. Then he felt a great desire to give his life in some definite Christian service. I only had to show him clearly the duty of giving the best to the Highest, for him to see his first task. Although already of age, he began to study at school, and became a good student. Now, in college, he has become a cultured, able, fully developed Christian worker. He is giving himself for the ministry and has made himself as fine a gift as he can. We miss some of our young people this year; but we know they are away, preparing the sacrifice, preparing their minds and their bodies for the altar of service. I dwell on this because it is glorious to serve our Lord with all our ransomed powers. That doesn't mean you have to enjoy a college course to be a Christian worker! No indeed. But it does mean that it is a poor sort of dedication that does not involve a faithful study of the Bible, a careful discipline of the will, a ready hand for opportunity, an eager heart for love. We have in our church young folks who borrow the pastor's most helpful books on Christian ideals, Christian heroes, Christian methods, and the pastor is glad. He is happy, as every pastor is, when some young fellow comes to him with eager face and says, "Show me how I can be more useful to Jesus Christ."

"I beseech you" to give yourself body and soul to the Master. "By the mercies of God," considering all his goodness and his provision for us here and hereafter. Paul could command; but he begs, he urges. And so winning it is—reminding us how reasonable, how in accord with our spiritual nature, how fundamental beneath any church-going or rites or ceremonies of religion.

Not Conformed to This World

FROM this ideal of godliness we are continually seduced by the low and common aspirations of our age, of our associates, of the dead level of selfish uninspired humanity. We must are to be different, bravely resolve to li on a higher plane, raise our comrades we can, and never let them drag us d vn. I waited an hour in a garage the er day and heard two young men con rse in the vilest, dirtiest speech I ver heard. I had to ask one of them he always spoke and thought like at My companion finally insisted on eir silence since they could not talk d erently! How life and character mu be vulgarized by many! How ugly he world must look! I wished with a ny heart that I could see those boys t nsformed, clean-mouthed, high-soule

And this Christ has done in cou ess lives. What a Gospel, what a sugge ive Scripture is this in I Corinthia 6: "Thieves, covetous, drunkards, e ortioners . . . such were some of ou: but ye were washed, ye were sancti l." These evil-doers of Corinth were led to be saints, and transformed. T nsformed: the reeling, staggering d ikard into an apostle of temperan a patient, radiant reclaimer of those ho suffer defeat as he once suff ed. Transformed: a worldly, selfish wo an, caring for luxury and ease, into a ver of struggling girls, a giver to od causes from the local church to he farthest field of missions, a pray ful Christian. Transformed: a boy, thou htless, ignorant, profane, into a y ng man, reverent, serviceable, friendl to the uplift of all who cross his th. Now this is simply true. Only we ve not always opened wide the gates o ur hearts to that renewing, transfor ng divine will. Be ye renewed, an renewed again, from grace to grace, at progressively ye may be lifted high

Boys and girls, do you get this essage? The world, the fleshly natur he selfish, pleasure-loving crowd, all y, "Conform, conform!" By voice xample, temptation, tendency, your ul will hear the whisper, "Be like u be like us." But to conform mean to come down. To be transformed, t sfigured, listen to Christ saying to t se who will hear, "Friend, come up higher."

Humility and Ministry

NOW Paul speaks of personal con ct as members of Christ's body he church. He seems to give two wa hwords: "Be meek," "Be use ." Christian love is not puffed up, see th not her own. A conceited Christi is almost a contradiction in terms. A Christian dominated by self-esteem nd seeking self-glory is off the way at leads to blessedness. Be humble. If you have great gifts, it should make ou think soberly—for of you will muc be expected. Besides, what have you at you did not receive?

But most of our young people are ot boastful but over-timid—they dispa ge what God our Father gave them. is too is irreverent. What would ou think of a lad who depised his birt ay presents, never used them at all, ecause some other boy had more? ou are a member of the body, the chu h; therefore, according to Paul, you ve some gift. Find it, use it, develo t, make it grow. If it's teaching, te h. Because you cannot be a college p sident are you dodging a little Bible sc ol class of five or six beginners in ne Word? If it's giving, give. What p r, illiberal giving sometimes by those o have so much! Also, my friends, w at failures by us who are not so well ff giving less than we can! Ten c ts seems small for a picture show, and s, it seems plenty for world-missions, or God's outreaching kingdom in all ne earth. If it's exhorting—but wait a t. This word is the word applied to ne Holy Spirit by Jesus in the Gospe of John: the Comforter, the Encoura r, the Helper by your side. What a bles d ministry to be a bringer of courage, n enheartener, a comfort-bearer, a poi r to the upward way!

"I made men glad," my Lord will say,

I eased a sister's troubled mind;

A Christian Chapter of Proverbs

Y fellow students, I love the third paragraph of Romans 12, from verse the end. Sometimes I join chapter ith it as one passage. It was Words- th who called it "a Christian chapter roverbs." Little, crisp, snappy sen- es from the same pen that wrote e wonderful paragraphs that Light- calls "coils of thought." This is l's common-sense philosophy gleam- with reflections from high places ision. We all treasure the old book Proverbs, too, the distilled wisdom Hebrew sages. But by contrast— , we realize how the coming of Jesus ed the plane. Even in these prac- l admonitions we discern "the light he knowledge of the glory of God in face of Jesus Christ."

hese sententious sayings are the m of Paul's personal experience con- ing the ordinary necessities of istian living. It covers sorrow and prayer and good works, hospitality persecution, business and friend-). Of these things are the warp and f of character made up. Whatever the pattern chosen by God for the vidual—these threads are worked in e or there. Happy are we if all find r due proportion in life and are hfully used for the fabric that we are paring for the earthly garments of God.

The Law of Love

HESE proverbs for daily living head up in Jesus' second commandment, hou shalt love thy neighbor as thy- ." Or as Paul puts it in a Christian verb—"Love worketh no ill to his ghbor: love therefore is the fulfil- nt of the Law." The law of Moses ; chiefly expressed in negatives, pro- itions of wrong acts toward others. l wisely says, love renders these all out of the question: love then fulfils, completes, indeed, one might say, supersedes the law. With Christian love fully swaying your heart, the civil law itself is superfluous. As Paul remarks, it is for evildoers. Disciples of Jesus need not be watched by policemen.

Do take time on this lesson to run over verses 9 to 21 at least, under the heading suggested by Dr. Garvie in the New Century Bible: "The Law of Love in its Manifold Applications." Notice the singular introduction—love must be without hypocrisy. A hypocrite is a man wearing a mask that hides his real nature. This love must be the very personality of the man himself. See how Paul begins with "love of the brethren" in that fine sentence that includes verses 10 to 13. See the very next sentence—"bless persecutors." Then he broadens out to good will to all people everywhere, honor to all souls. "peace with all men." How deep, tender, whimsical are his qualifications of that last item. "If it be possible"—peace with all men. "As much as in you lieth," anyway, peace with all men. At least, he goes on, don't be vengeful. If you can't help thinking they ought to be punished—leave it to God, "I will recompense, saith the Lord.". For your part, feed your enemy, give him to drink, heap coals of fire, overcome evil with good.

Truly we shall be practical Christians if we do these things, so simple, yet so essential and so hard and high. Now we take leave of Paul, so far as the lesson series is concerned. Hear him say, humbly, pleadingly, "Be ye imitators of me. The things which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me, these things do: and the God of peace shall be with you."

"I showed men God," my Lord will say.
When we meet at the end of the King's highway.
"I walked with the beggar along the road.
I kissed the bondman, stung by the goad,
I bore my half of the porter's load.
And what did you?" my Lord will say.
"As you traveled along the King's highway?"

Sunday School Methods

FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

w to Approach the Lesson in the Class

HOUSE may be very beautifully furnished, and we may greatly desire our friends to see it, but it of first importance that we provide d front steps and a door, if we are to w the treasures of the interior. ny a well-studied lesson has gone nought because of a lack of good proach. These experiences of other chers may help:

Here is a teacher of college girls who es not review the previous Sunday's son as an approach:

usually have some one give me the inter- ing history, should there be any, but try vary my methods as much as possible. casionally I give a preview of the next on, but do not spend any time reviewing last.

A teacher of seventeen-year-old girls es this plan:

Either the scholar's assignment for prepa- ion or some every-day illustration, perhaps hould say point of contact. Also I find a ect question requiring thought will always n attention.

With a class of 100 married men, a orgia teacher's method is this:

ive historical background if appropriate: nect up to last lesson where there is any nection either in events or characters.

A teacher of a Colorado class of ven girls fourteen to sixteen years of e says:

Sometimes I ask for a brief review, some- nes I call for the story of the lesson at once. case of lessons on one character I usually for facts concerning him.

A New Jersey teacher of boys says:

I review salient points in previous lesson, rticularly principles brought out there.

A Colorado teacher of girls:

I use the most striking point between the last son and the present.

A New York State teacher's plan is "to ow the big points and have a climax."

A Pennsylvania teacher's plan is:

Almost as varied as the lessons, but usually try to find a present-day story or incident as an illustration to the central thought of the lesson.

Other plans tried are:

Five-minute statement by leader.
Speak of intervening events.
Geography of lesson.
Review and connection, then reading of text.
Present lesson in form of narrative.
Use picture or story or newspaper clipping.
Generally start right in with lesson.

For teachers of classes of beginners and primary children, suggestions have come as follows:

Beginners

I always review the last lesson and get the Golden Text fixed in their little minds, then ask if they would like to hear a story about (the person or subject of the new lesson), and they are always ready.

I usually begin with an experience I know to be familiar to my class and branch out from that to the lesson.

I make the review lead to the new lesson if possible by something the children know or understand.

I approach the lesson by connecting it with the preceding lesson and with knowledge and experience the children already have. Whenever objects can be used I approach the lesson through them as an eye-gate.

Primary Teachers

I usually use a short story illustrating the truth you want to bring out in the lesson and if possible one drawn from the every-day experience of the child.

I tell some story that will contain the lesson truth—one outside of the Bible, often from my own childhood or some child's that I know.

I have some scholar tell the story of the previous lesson and then I tell them what is between that lesson and the one for the day.

1. Relate some story.
2. Show them some object.
3. Use the introduction the graded lesson gives.

We always repeat the Lord's prayer as the approach. This seems to bring them closer and quiets them down.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON the Dobrudja front of Rumania the Teutons continued all the past week to drive their enemies before them to the north. The Rumanians, however, before the capture of Cernavoda succeeded in blowing up the famous bridge crossing the Danube at that point, and thus placing a serious obstacle in the way of Teutonic advance on the capital. This bridge, by the way, is the longest bridge in the world, twelve miles, and ten years were required for its construction. This great length was necessitated by the fact that on the western side of the Danube the ground is very low, at all seasons boggy, and the marshes some of the time overflowed, so that occasionally the river is ten or eleven miles wide in place of its normal three miles.

By October 29 the Russo-Rumanians had been forced far north from the railroad, and had taken up a defensive position on the line running east from Hirsova. But their stand on this line was of very short duration and a couple of days later saw them driven from these positions, Hirsova captured by the Teutons, and their retreat northward again begun; at the end of the week they had fallen back more than half the distance from the railroad to the Russian frontier. This northern portion of Rumania is a gigantic morass, particularly in that part traversed by the Danube after it turns toward the east and breaks into many arms in its flow toward the Black Sea. Such a country is, of course, difficult to move large masses of troops in, and practically impossible for artillery. Consequently we may expect to see the Russians and Rumanians make an effort, before proceeding much farther to the north, to cross the Danube to the west and unite with their comrades on the western bank. In its present position it is in danger of complete destruction.

On the northern front the week has been comparatively devoid of startling movements. While the Rumanians with their Russian allies are making a fairly strong stand on their own territory south of the Carpathians, they nevertheless are being slowly forced back.

The stake being fought for is the possession of the Rumanian oil fields. These oil fields, which are all located along the line where the southerly slopes of the Carpathians melt into the plains of Rumania, are of extreme importance to the Teutons, since they produce something over 1,700,000 tons of oil in ordinary years. In peace times about 8 per cent. of their production went to Germany, 26½ per cent. to Great Britain and 17½ per cent. to France. These oil fields, together with those of Galicia already in Teutonic possession, could supply all the needs of the Central Empires and their allies, not only for military but also for all civilian purposes. To prevent this, naturally the Rumanians are putting forth their best efforts, and thanks to the arrival during the week of strong Russian reinforcements are succeeding to a degree. Furthermore, the coming on of winter with its attendant snows has worked to the advantage of the Rumanians.

Still, at the end of the week, in all the principal passes leading southward from Transylvania through the Carpathians, the Teutonic Allies seem to be firmly established south of the main ridge on Rumanian soil, with particularly favorable positions in those passes which lie to the south of Kronstadt. Indeed, south of the Torzburg pass, the Teutons are in possession of the town of Dragoslavele, only six miles northeast of Kimpolung, at the head of the railway leading to Bucharest.

Farther to the west, in the Juil valley, the Rumanians had the best of the week's fighting, and not only drove back the Teutons a considerable distance, but took about 1,500 prisoners, as well as some artillery. In the Alt valley there has been continuous hard fighting all the week.

THE submarines have been active during the past week, and many victims are reported. Mr. Runciman stated in the House of Commons, according to a report in the London Times of October 18, that the loss in ships ascribed to submarines since the war began amounted to about 2,000,000 net tons, or 3,000,000 tons dead weight. So serious is the shortage of ships that some of the British papers are soberly advocating that the small nations, such as Chile, for instance, be compelled either to utilize the German vessels which have taken refuge in their harbors or to seize those vessels and charter them to Great Britain.

On the Macedonian front, on the left wing of the Allied army, the Serbians continued their efforts to advance on Monastir, and severe but very indecisive fighting has been continuous all the week in the bend of the Cerna river and in the region of Brod.

The Commonwealth of Australia on a referendum ballot has apparently rejected, though the votes of the soldiers actually on the field are still to be counted, the application of compulsory military service—in other words, conscription. This result is said to be largely due to the votes of the women.

It is now computed that the total number of deaths among all the armies resulting from the war is about 6,000,000, a number greater than the population of any American state except New York and Pennsylvania.

The truth of the British report regarding the results of the German naval raid of October 27 in the channel, reported last week, was challenged by Admiral William H. Henderson, retired, in a public letter to the London Times, in which this officer stated, in addition to other bitter criticism of the British official reports, that the reports of the Admiralty "for some time have been lacking in sincerity." Much discussion of a more or less acrimonious character followed in and out of Parliament, and on October 30 Mr. Balfour, First Lord of the Admiralty, stated in Parliament that six vessels besides the Queen, the Flirt and the Nubian had been sunk by the Germans in the raid.

On the Picardy front the early days of the week were consumed in an artillery duel of considerable violence, most fierce around Sailly-Sallisel, north of the Somme, and in the vicinity of Bouchavesnes and Biaches to the south. After this, minor infantry fighting took place on the British front near and around Les Bœufs, which resulted in little. On Monday, however, the Germans launched a counter-attac in force on the French south o the Somme, and after a stiff fight aptured portions of their former tre hes north of La Maisonnette and i the region of Biaches. In addition 400 prisoners were taken by the Ger ns.

On the same day, north of the So me, the British made slight gains bet een Les Bœufs and Morval, and the F nch northwest of Sailly-Sallisel. The ext day was very quiet, neither side m ing a move, while on November 1, no of the Somme the British attack in force on the Gueudecourt-Les ufs line in the general direction of Bapa me, but apparently gained little nc ground.

The rest of the week was featu less on this front.

THE fighting at Verdun settled down ring the past week to a steady mutual ammering with artillery, the French a lery concentrating a crushing fire on Fort aux while the infantry held the fort almc encircled. The Germans evacuated the f on the night of November first and it was oc pied by the French on the second. Before le ing, the German troops blasted away imp ant parts of the work. The recovery of orts Douaumont and Vaux places in French nds again the only parts of the outer ring the Verdun fortifications which were taken the Germans. The Germans still hold the tensive field works before Verdun whic the French built after the destruction of Lie and Namur had developed the futility of ol tyle forts.

According to the Associated Press, a le thy audience between King Constantine a the Russian and British ministers on Octo 27 resulted in a complete understanding, ich was expected to arrange things more tisfactorily for the king, Venizelos an the Entente powers. By this agreement, eek troops were to be withdrawn from the ovinces of Thessaly and Epirus into the so tern peninsula of Peloponnesus and the eek National Railway from Athens to Laris was to be turned over to the control of the E nte powers. French troops were also to be ithdrawn from Athens as fast as the gover ent continued to demonstrate its ability to aintain order. On October 29 a Greek st ner, the Angelika, which was proceeding rom Piraeus to Salonica with about 150 cers and men, of the Venizelist forces, wa torpedoed and beached. About fifty live vere lost. The Greek vessel Kiki-Issaias wa also torpedoed on November 1. She was re rted to be bound for Salonica with provision On October 31, replying to questions in the use of Commons, Lord Robert Cecil, Mini r of War Trade, denied by implication th the Allies were propping up King Constant by withholding recognition of former p nier Venizelos, but intimated that the Allies uld recognize the Venizelos government whe ver it was found that a majority of the eek people favored the movement.

A pitched battle was reported to be minent at Katerina on the Larissa Rail in Greece on November 3, between Ver ilst soldiers and Royalist troops. On Nov ber 2, 600 Venizelists occupied Katerina, ing the Greek garrison of 150 men to evacu the town. The Greek king promptly ord d a force of 4,000 loyal troops only thirty iles away to attack the Venizelists at once. enzelos is said to have raised already an ar of 30,000 men of the 100,000 he asked for hile the king's army is estimated at 35,000 The situation at Katerina on November 3 h all the primary elements of a revolution.

Interest and Enthusiasm

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

“YOU must meet Dick!” The dainty little butterfly girl was the one who said it first. “You t meet Dick!” echoed her mother. u must meet Dick!” the business , and the doctor, and the pastor told “Oh, you must meet Dick,” said tired school-teacher.

Who is this—Dick?” I asked at Dick?” was the answer. It came er vaguely. “Why, Dick is—he's a mighty fine boy.”

Well, why,” I questioned, “why t I meet him? Everybody tells me I must!”

Everybody likes Dick,” I was told. erybody says a good word for him. rybody likes him. That's why!”

Is he good looking?” I wanted to w—“one of the handsome sort?”

Oh, no,” they told me; “he's just rdinary chap—as far as looks go!”

ND then, one evening, I met Dick. I met him at one of those old-ioned little parties where the twelve-old daughter and the seventy-year-grandmother are both having a good . The butterfly girl was at that y, and her mother, and the business , and the doctor, and the pastor, the tired school-teacher. And when k came in I saw that he was smiling that a bit of his smile seemed to ect on each face. And I saw him d down and whisper something into butterfly girl's ear. And I saw him her mother's hand as he stopped to k to her. And I saw him tell an iously funny story to the business , and the business man—who had n tired—threw back his head and ghed long and loud. I saw him take ny clipping out of his pocket, and a ment later he was reading it, dra-tically, to the teacher and the pastor, seemed equally interested.

ick was not a handsome boy. But wasn't commonplace. For his face the most interested face that I have r seen. He would have been just a t of any crowd on the street if it had been for a certain look in his eyes—a tain look that seemed to see every-ng—to be glad about the happy ngs, and sad about the unhappy s.

nd then Dick was introduced to me. d before long I found myself piloted o a corner of the room, and Dick was king to me. He was asking me about work—asking me intelligent ques-ns. He was enthusiastic about ries that I had read and liked. He s interested. He was so interested that personality fairly radiated at one; interested, even in commonplace sonal things, that I forgot whether was plain or handsome; so interested t his very manner was charming. d as he talked to me I knew why all those others had liked him. I knew tinctively that he listened just as in-estedly to an account of the butterfly l's parties as he did to the details of doctor's most successful operation. new that he was genuinely enthusi-ic over the mother's mince pie and pastor's latest sermon.

THE next day I found myself saying to a stranger: “Do you know Dick? Oh, you must meet him!”

I READ an article a while ago in one of our weekly magazines, an article that made a vast impression on me. It was short, concise, and the heading of it ran something like this: “If you have only one gift to give your son, let that gift be enthusiasm.”

The author of the article told about an experience that the manager of a large concern had in hiring an experienced salesman. He wrote and made appointments with two men in two different cities. And then, on one of his many business trips, he stopped at one of the cities and saw the first man.

The first man was a clever salesman, and the manager knew that he would make good in the new work, but . . . “I'd like the position,” said the first man; “there's a great deal of money in it.” That was his reason for wanting it. And the manager left without making any decision. And so he wired the second man that he would stop off and call.

When the train arrived at the station the second man himself came into the car. He was bubbling over with eagerness to prove that he could hold down any position; he was vehemently enthusiastic about the certain position that had been offered to him. Before they reached the destination the manager had acquired some of his spirit; and before the manager left he had become fired with interest and enthusiasm.

The second man got the position—although, probably, the first man was just as clever in business. The second man got it because he was interested and enthusiastic—so interested and enthusiastic that he made his personality felt—and liked.

IT isn't the man or girl who does the most talking, either, who is always the most enthusiastic. I have known silent people who were such interested listeners that they were always in demand—that everybody liked them. I've known girls who, by their manner in listening to the most commonplace story, could make it gleam with a reflected glory of enthusiasm. I have known hopelessly plain people who looked almost beautiful when their eyes were lighted with a glow of interest.

“ISN'T Mary tactful?” some people exclaim. Very often the meaning might be translated this way: “Isn't Mary interested?” All the people who told me that Dick was “a mighty fine boy” really meant that he was a mightily interested and enthusiastic one.

If you want to make friends, if you want to keep friends, try to become interested in their interests. If you want to make good at your work, try to be enthusiastic about it. If you are, you'll win. Don't affect the interest and enthusiasm, for, if you do, it won't be the real thing. Put a bit of your heart into your work, a bit of your spirit into your play, and imagine your own self in the other man's place, and it will be the real thing.

Among the Workers

HE nurses of the Bethesda Leper Home again appeal to readers of the Christian rald for bandage material, which is a prime ential in their work throughout the year. l but clean linen, cotton, cheesecloth, pillow s or sheets should be torn and made up in ls one inch to four inches wide, the pieces ng fastened together at the ends with a stitches, not pinned. Bandage material st be kept clean, and, as the voyage is long, must be securely packed. If sent by prepaid press there will be no expense for delivery New York. The lepers also need soft wels, muslin and underwear, white stockings, nknives, eye-shades, absorbent cotton, seline and other hospital supplies. Contri-tions should be sent to R Dan Wolterbeek, Park Row, New York City.

R. GRACEY, a missionary at Van, Armenia, reports to the American Board at only three or four of the Van mission ildings are standing intact. The Russian cials are cordial and aid materially in caring for the returning Armenian refugees. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief are providing funds to care for the refugees who fled to Russia and Persia. There are some most sympathetic and devoted German women who are doing excellent relief work among the refugees in Northern Syria. Throughout the entire war area in the Balkans and in Turkey the cost of living has greatly increased.

REV. J. C. TETER, who with Mrs. Teter conducts at Mineola, Fla., a retreat known as “Saints' Rest,” for worn-out ministers and missionaries, and whose work has often been mentioned in the Christian Herald, was the first man to enter the tabernacle for the first service of the Billy Sunday meetings in Detroit. If it seems that Mr. Teter was far from home, it must be remembered that “Saints' Rest” could accommodate more saints if it were completely furnished, and Mr. Teter has found many generous friends in the North whose aid alone has made his work possible.

SAXON “SIX”

No other car of similar price can give Saxon “Six” service

So if you choose another in the price class of Saxon “Six” you must make up your mind to do without the advantages of Saxon “Six.”

You'll have to content yourself with less smoothness, less quietness, less flexibility, less acceleration, and pay more in higher upkeep cost.

But will you be content? We think not.

If for practically the same price you can have all that your neighbor enjoys who owns a Saxon “Six”, why should you put up with the shortcomings of some other car?

Why take “second best” when you can just as easily have the best?

And it is clearly evident by now that Saxon “Six” is the best car in its price class.

No fine phrases can dispute the cold facts of Saxon “Sixes” abler performance.

It will win you in a single road trial. Saxon “Six” is $815 f. o. b. Detroit.

The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia

An Encyclopaedia that for magnitude and importance has never been equaled in America. The foremost product of the age. A work that every earnest student of the Bible may reverently trust. Its contributors are all scholarly men—its spirit is that of the Bible. The latest discoveries in archaeology and the most recent conclusions in Biblical criticism have made such an up-to-date Encyclopaedia a necessity.

JAMES ORR, M. A., D. D., General Editor

An Entirely New Work From Beginning to End

At last the Clergyman, the Bible Student, the Sunday School Teacher and the Layman can secure an unbiased and complete reference work on the Bible. An Encyclopaedia so thorough, so complete, so fair that it is indispensable to all serious students of the Bible. So far surpasses anything ever attempted that it stands alone in its field. "A Bible Dictionary that may mark a new era—its publication a great event in the world of Bible study," says the Sunday School Times. This monumental work is the result of the joint labors of nearly 200 eminent contributors—men universally recognized as authorities; master minds in their chosen calling. There are many ways in which this work far surpasses any work of like nature.

A stupendous work, scholarly and exhaustive in content. A gem of the printer's art. Typography and illustrations are of rare merit and beauty. Photographs unsurpassed in book work. 16 Maps in colors—have a distinctiveness which cannot be appreciated until seen. Words cannot justly describe this remarkable work. It is up-to-date in every detail. You cannot fully appreciate this Encyclopaedia until you have it in your home. Apply it to your individual needs. It will satisfy your desires in every way. There are no stones left unturned. Here are but Reliability This new Encyclopaedia accepts only established truth. It refuses to yield Scripture to unconfirmed theories. Frankly conservative, it builds up rather than pulls down.

Six Paramount Features of this Remarkable Work

Fairness Every phase of all subjects is treated; even both sides of disputed questions, oftentimes different contentions being upheld by different writers. Thus you may know all, and judge for yourself.

Completeness The Editors have striven to include everything that might throw light on the message of the Word of God. Refer to this work for anything—ask it any question, and you will get an authoritative answer.

Readability The writers are scholarly men—recognized authorities; their knowledge is recorded in simple language which may be easily read and understood by everyone. Simplicity and clearness is the rule, not the exception.

Compactness The wealth of knowledge and information given by this work is confined within the covers of five convenient volumes. Easy to read, easy to handle; classified and indexed so as to be readily accessible.

Low Price In wealth of scholarship, skill in assembling the vast store of information, and excellence of printing, binding, illustrating, etc., this is the most valuable Biblical work, yet the cost is small.

The Grace of Gratitude

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic (Thanksgiving Meeting). Ps. 107 : 1–43.

"OH that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" The One Hundred and Seventh Psalm is the Thanksgiving Psalm. Thrice after measuring the manifold mercies of God, it reaches this climax. Thanksgiving Day is an abiding evidence of the real spiritual foundation of this Republic. In this year of 1916 we have even more than usual for which to give thanks. With almost all the world at war, we are at peace. With gaunt famine gripping whole nations, we have ample crops. With financial ruin threatening whole peoples, we are prosperous to the point of surfeit. But let us not be too thankful for our prosperity; it is much too tainted with the scent of blood. With all the world in need, we have enough and to spare. And is it not something to be thankful for that America, busy, prosperous, at peace, is face to face with the greatest opportunity for service in her history? America, who fed the famine-wasted of India, who succored the flood-bound of China, who for two years has kept food in the mouths of the Belgians, this same America is still left free to bind up the grievous wounds of a world at war. And again, free, strong America may at last be the agency through which will come the peace for which the world prays. With all our individual blessings for which we usually give thanks, we this year, as a nation, can thank Go that we are not as other nation that, sinful though we are, his has kept us and his grace has led paths of usefulness and of world s in his name.

Cultivating the Thanksgiving Ha

Epworth League Topic. Col. 2 : II Cor. 9 : 11, 12.

SOME habits are worth cultiv and the habit of being thank one of the good ones. We hav national Thanksgiving Day but year, and it is to be presumed tha the grumpiest of us is at least pa enough to appear thankful on tha But why be thankful only on one Most of us cannot begin to do j to our blessings in one day of tha ness. If we would only take st our successes rather than of ou feats, of our friends rather than enemies, of the grain we gathere our bins rather than of the cr gathered in anticipation, of the words we hear rather than of t sinuations we think we sense, of th that is ours and of the grace o which keeps us, we would find th had not time enough in which fully thankful. By all means cultivate the habit of giving thank us show appreciation to those abo and above all, let us keep a gr heart open toward God, who bles far above our deservings. The ence and discussion of the Chr Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topics may well be used in connection this topic.

The Williamsburg Hebrew Christian Missio

UPWARD of twenty years ago the Williamsburg Mission to the Jews was founded by Leopold Cohn, a Hebrew, who a short time previous had been converted to Christianity. For several years past, rumors reflecting on the conduct of the mission and its superintendent, Mr. Cohn, have been in circulation, and more recently circular letters and printed statements containing specific allegations as to irregularities and misconduct have been sent through the mails to friends of Jewish work. At the suggestion of several Christian organizations and Christian workers, steps were taken to form an independent committee of investigation which would thoroughly examine the charges. The committee consisted of Rev. John F. Carson, D.D., of Brooklyn, Mr. Hugh R. Monro, of New York, and Mr. E. B. Buckalew, secretary to the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. The charges laid before the committee may be grouped under three general headings: (1) Financial irregularities; (2) inefficiency in the conduct of the (3) charges affecting the personal acter of Mr. Cohn. As the result extended inquiry, the committe made a report which finds tha charge that money subscribed fo work of the mission was devoted to purposes, and that the financial me are generally lax, is wholly wi foundation; that the charge of ciency is not sustained; and tha charges reflecting on the personal acter of Rev. Leopold Cohn are w unsustained. On the other hand, has been abundant testimony by tors, missionaries, and other Chr workers of the highest characte proving of the work of the missio the character and Christian devot its founder and superintendent. report concludes with the express the committee's conviction that Leopold Cohn "is entitled to the fidence of the Christian public, and the Williamsburg Mission to the J an effective missionary agency."

A Word to the Wise

IN years past you were kind enough to urge your readers to shop early for Christmas. The Consumers' League appreciates your generous response to its appeal for this publicity. By it you made real to many shoppers their individual responsibility for the late hours, overwork and resulting fatigue, which turn Merry Christmas into Miserable Christmas for many workers.

Your efforts and those of other public-minded editors have brought about in the last ten years many changes in holiday shopping methods. There is a tendency toward an earlier and more thoughtful choosing of gifts. Merchants consequently plan to get their holiday goods on the shelves in November to make shopping early in the day and early in the season more convenient for their customers; to close their stores in the evening.

But, unfortunately, this is as yet only a tendency. Christmas still finds thousands of clerks, bookkeepers and delivery men exhausted by the unnecessary strain of the hideous overwork which is caused by the negligence and thoughtlessness of a procrastinating public.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

PRAYER and faith are inseparably linked together. When Jesus was teaching his disciples how to pray, he said, according to Mark 11:24, "Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Jesus here expressed one of the unalterable laws of grace which govern prayer.

There have come to the knowledge of the editors recently two instances of the way in which God takes care of those who fully trust him, especially if they are trying to do work for him. In the state of New York there is a woman, a deaconess, working among the poor, especially the aged and dependent. For several years now this woman has kept more than eighty old people from want, most of them persons whom she has brought to a saving knowledge of Christ. She herself is a woman of no property; she has never asked a cent from anybody, but has carried her own needs and those of her charges to God in prevailing prayer; and the money has come to her when, and only when, it was needed.

Another instance is of a converted Hindoo woman in India, who for many years has conducted a school for outcast widows whom she has rescued from almost unspeakable conditions, has educated, taught the story of the Christ, and then trained to go out into the highways and byways of India and carry the message to those who are hungry to hear it. At times several hundred girls have been in this school, and yet at no time has the company thus gathered together suffered real want, although their needs have been met only by the utmost endeavor of each to do all possible for the support of the work. Sometimes the need has exceeded their own strength; then they have rested solely on the power of God, have prayed in full faith, and have received.

MISS M. E. H. writes that she has been left alone in a home that is heavily mortgaged, and sees no way to prepare for the coming winter. She asks the prayers of the League that the Lord may speedily show her a way out. She says she has not been used to making a living, but can do some things if she has the opportunity. It is the opportunity for which she prays.

Mrs. C. McG. writes that throughout her life she has believed in answered prayer and in the efficacy of prayer in all things.

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at Newell, S. D.; Forestdale, Mass.; Boyertown, Pa.; Rogersville, Mo.; Corvallis, Ore.; Hale, Mo.; Quitman, Ga.; Sterling, Ill.; Farmington, N. C.; Cowarts, N. C.; Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio (pray for the union evangelistic meetings being conducted here); Hamptonville, N. C. (pray for the spread of the Gospel in Indo and that souls may be saved); Foochow, China (pray for a great revival at our Mintsing station); Chemung, N. Y. (for the success of revival meetings being held in the First Baptist Church); Bowling Green, Va. (for the success of a revival in the Milford Presbyterian Church); Indianapolis, Ind. (pray for meetings to be held here November 12); Hartford, N. Y. (that revival meetings now held here may result in the conversion of many precious souls); Tulsa, Okla. (that many may be saved during revival in the First Baptist Church); Charleston, W. Va. (that many may be saved during revival here); Washington, D. C. (pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit in a New England Church); Big Rapids, Mich., also Mancelona, Mich. (pray that Michigan may be voted dry); Amory, Miss. (pray that the campaign in Mississippi against whisky may be successful); Granada, Colo. (that the beer amendment in Colorado may be defeated and voted down); Pittsburg, Pa. (that all the saloons here may be closed).

Two parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; Mrs. J. W. H. asks prayer that child's mind may be restored; fourteen friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends.

Miss A. W. asks prayer that a doctor's sight may be restored; Miss M. C., that father's eye may be cured of cancer; two friends ask prayer that their mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. L. B., that husband's sight may be restored; nine other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; five wives, their husbands; M. C. asks prayer that a father may be cured of the liquor habit; fifteen that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

G. A. Y. asks prayer to be cured of the drug habit; M. F. G., that daughter may be cured of the drug habit.

Twenty-five parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; eighteen wives, their husbands; fifty-one, for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Five readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

Eighty-five ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including L. L. T., that pastor may be restored to health and strength; another, Mrs. E. G., that son may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. R. S., that son may regain the use of limbs and that his health may be restored; fifty-nine friends for healing for themselves. Eleven friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Forty-three ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Fifty-two friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

rooted in such a purity, is the ideal for every relation in life, be it personal, social, or international. Until we achieve it, we are not God's children, nor are the heritages of his kingdom ours.

When men and nations alike are constrained to make the Beatitudes the rule of their conduct, then, and not till then, will the Golden Age appear. During these last days we have longed for the manifestation of the Kingdom. We know that its triumph is certain, but we are tempted to exclaim, "How long, O Lord, how long?" "Make no tarrying, O my God!" Yet while we wait, distressed and baffled by the hideous spectacle of ruin and tragedy which Christendom now presents to our shrinking gaze, the very anarchy of the downfall should prompt us to return to the Magna Charta of this Sermon on the Mount. The vials of wrath poured out on church and state will not be spent in vain, if we are driven to repentance. For the Kingdom will not come except as we obey the conditions herein laid down. Not alone for our own sake, nor our individual good, but for the sake of the bleeding myriads of Europe and Asia, do we plead that believers cleave to the plain teaching of the Beatitudes, with full purpose of heart.

A New Aid to Bible Study

THE announcement of a new Bible Encyclopaedia, under the general editorship of Rev. Professor James Orr, D.D., one of the ripest Bible scholars of our time, is an event of sufficient importance to challenge the earnest attention of Bible students everywhere. The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, as the new publication is called, is admittedly conservative, yet from the first line to the last it is the product of the best Bible scholarship in two continents. Among Professor Orr's associates are men eminent in the study of doctrine, Biblical History, Prophecy, Archeology and Exploration, including such well-known names as Professors Sayce, Albert T. Clay, Camden Cobern, Melvin Grove Kyle, the erudite German scholar Wilhelm Möller, Conrad von Orelli, Professor G. Frederick Wright, and others. A special phalanx of consecrated scholarship, including Professor Robert Dick Wilson, Harold M. Wiener, Rev. W. St. Clair Tisdall, and others equally well known, stand for the defense of the Old Testament against the destructive critics, while some fifty others of authority in their line, among whom may be mentioned Professor Edgar J. Banks, the explorer, Dr. Lazarus Fletcher of the British Museum, Dr. James M. Gray of Chicago, Professor William M. McPheeters, Professor Flinders Petrie, Sir William Ramsay, Professor George L. Robinson, and many others, some of whose names are known to Christian Herald readers, contribute a great variety of scholarly and enlightening articles dealing with the results of the latest investigations on various lines of Bible study and interpretation.

To the great majority of Bible students, the test of value of any new Biblical Encyclopaedia must be made on four specific points: first, as to accuracy and completeness of statement; second, as to comprehensiveness, which should include all that is new and valuable in connection with archeological studies, explorations and investigations in Bible lands, especially where these have a direct bearing on the sacred Book itself; third, as to new philological discoveries which may affect Bible interpretation; and fourth, as to the absolutely up-to-date presentation of all that relates to the progress of Christianity and the Christian Church throughout the world, including the various phases of development in our own time.

WE have examined these five volumes of the International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia with a good deal of interest and satisfaction. In the presentation of the essential doctrines of the Christian faith it is clear, sound and comprehensive, a book which pastors, scholars, students and Bible readers will find of great service. The inspiration and unity of the Scriptures are defended, the theology of the old dispensation and the new are ably contrasted, and the various books of the Bible are dealt with individually in a manner creditable to able and reverent scholarship. Fifty pages are devoted to the life and ministry of Jesus Christ, in a compact review by Professor John James Maclaren, which is one of the finest features of the Encyclopaedia. On Baptism, the accepted view of the Baptists, by Dr. A. T. Robertson, is followed by the non-immersionist view by Professor Thomas M. Lindsay, and the Lutheran view by Professor W. H. T. Dau. The article on the Lord's Supper is treated in a similar way by authoritative writers belonging to different denominations.

Historically the International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia is abreast of all the recent discoveries that shed light on the remote past. The latest finds in Egypt, Babylonia, Palestine, Assyria and other ancient lands are here given, many of them being illustrated by excellent photographs, and the articles being written by men eminent in the field of archeological inquiry. Prophecy receives liberal attention, and each of the prophetic books of the Old Testament has its appropriate setting and interpretation.

In the preface to the first volume, it is explained that "in harmony with the practical and authoritative character of the Encyclopaedia, the greatest pains have been taken to secure comprehensiveness and completeness in its presentation of all Biblical matters, and in its fulness of typical Scriptural references on all subjects dealt with. In scope, the work embraces the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha, together with all related subjects of language, text, literature (apocalyptic, apocryphal, sub-apostolic, etc.), archeology, historical and religious environment—whatever, in short, may throw light on the meaning and message of the sacred Book. The aim has been that nothing great or small conducing to this end shall be omitted."

As to the religious attitude of the Encyclopaedia, we believe the distinguished editors and associates have carried out faithfully and ably their purpose as they have outlined it in these words: "An important question in connection with a new reference work of this kind is the attitude to be assumed by its writers toward matters fundamental to the newer learning, in so far as the latter deals with the structure, critical treatment, inspiration, and authority of the Bible. Scholarship alone cannot be the deciding factor here, for the scholarship of different minds leads to widely different conclusions, determined often by the ultimate presuppositions on which the treatment of a subject is based. The spirit so widely prevalent in our day, which rejects the idea of the supernatural in nature and history, and the criticism which proceeds on that basis, must reach entirely different results from those attained by that attitude of mind and heart which reverently accepts a true revelation of God in the history of Israel and in Christ. It is the former spirit which eviscerates Christianity of most of the vital truths which the church, resting on Scripture, has always regarded as of its essence. With such a spirit, and with the treatment of Biblical subjects resulting from it, the present Encyclopaedia disclaims all sympathy. In fact, its general attitude may be described as that of a reasonable conservatism."

We believe that there was need of such a work as the present, and that the International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia will be a welcome aid to Christian scholarship.

It is published in five large illustrated volumes, aggregating 3,500 pages, by The Howard-Severance Company, Chicago, Ill.

CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

Just David

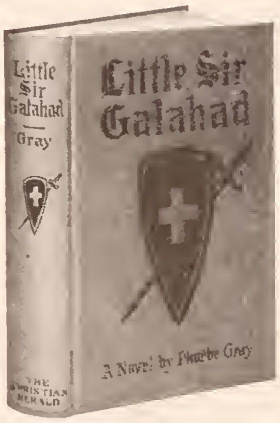
We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription, accompanied by $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.50



"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

We will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year, and send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," for $2.50.

AMARILLY IN BOOK FORM

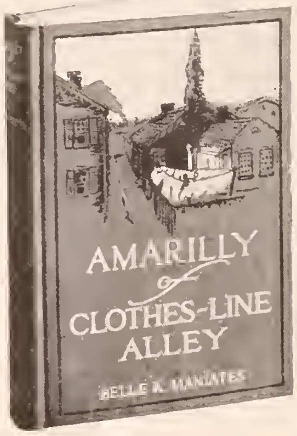
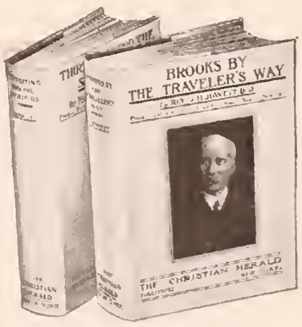
We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex, and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. In the human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers, there will await you many laughs; and a tear or two as well.



We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send "Amarilly" to old subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.



Two Books by a Famous Pastor

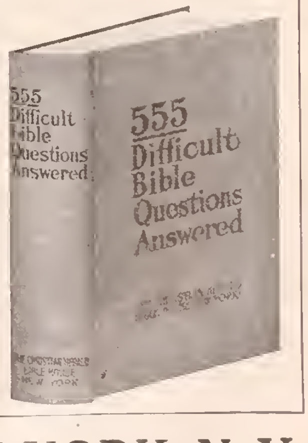
Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page. Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition.

These two volumes aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50. Or, we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered

Here is a book which has had a wonderful success, and every lover of the Bible should possess a copy. Indeed it is a wonderful help to Bible study. This book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-seven years. Its theology is thoroughly sound.

The beauty of this book is that it answers those very questions which you are always on the point of asking but for some reason don't. These half thousand and more questions have been asked in one form or another by thousands and thousands of human beings like yourself and have been answered through the Christian Herald Mail-Bag by experts.



We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.35. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

This Water Bottle Guaranteed For Two Years

Do you know all the ways you can use a good hot water bottle for your health and comfort? Get the kind the doctors recommend—the guaranteed Kantleek.

KANTLEEK

Water Bottle

We guarantee Kantleek, because we know it has the quality, workmanship and built-in wear that make the two-year guarantee possible, practical and valuable to you.

Dolly's Water Bottle Will Please Your Little Girl

Your little girl would love to have one of these miniature hot water bottles. For ten cents and the name of your dealer (if you state whether he sells Kantleek) we'll send you one. We will also send some interesting literature on Kantleek Rubber Goods that will convince you that it pays to buy goods of standard quality.

The Kantleek is made of pure rubber, moulded into one solid piece by a process exclusively our own. It can't leak, because there are no seams to open up. It won't crack and split, because it is made of pure rubber that defies time and frequent usage. There's not a weak spot in the Kantleek. Edges, top and bottom are as elastic and leak-proof as the sides.

Most good dealers handle Kantleek Water Bottles and the Kantleek line of rubber specialties. They are sold with a written guarantee.

The Kantleek is the kind of hot water bottle you need in your home right now. Buy one. It may cost you a trifle more than a cheap water bottle, but the additional wear it gives more than offsets the difference in cost. See your dealer today. You'll make no mistake buying a Kantleek.

The Electoral Pivot Moves West

WOODROW WILSON will succeed himself as President of the United States. While his election was not quite conceded by the Republican campaign organization, there ared no reason on November 11 to doubt that the rican people had given the man who has represented before the world for four years a new lease of power h, in the terms of European statesmanship, would enoted a vote of confidence. The electoral vote on ember 11 stood 276 to 255.

hen night fell upon the presidential campaign of 6 it found the leaders of both the principal parties ning the election. Both based their claims upon ful canvasses, upon the reports of experienced ical investigators, and the reports were very much e in that they showed over the whole country a rising degree of reticence on the part of many people refused to state definitely where they stood. It a case of "so many hundreds are for us, so many dreds against us, and so many hundreds are non-mittal, but—" Each party took the liberty of slating this "but" in its own favor, with possibly a e more assurance in the Democratic prediction than he Republican, since Chairman Vance C. McCormick he Democratic National Committee was willing to lict an electoral vote for Mr. Wilson of 364, while irman William R. Willcox of the Republican Na-al Committee was only willing to claim a majority ot less than one hundred electoral votes.

y midnight on Tuesday, with the returns in from the er states, it appeared that Mr. Hughes had been ted. The morning papers of Wednesday showed Hughes leading with 253 electoral votes, and 200 for Mr. Wilson, ten states being in doubt. As the day gressed and the returns began coming in from the outlying incts, Hughes failed to gain, while the Wilson vote crawled and up, until by Thursday morning the chances of the two didates appeared about even, with the result hinging upon nesota, North Dakota, California, New Mexico and New pshire. By midnight Thursday it became evident that the sident had won California, his plurality with only 47 precincts sing being 2,965 votes. He also held New Mexico and North kota by pluralities sufficiently large to cover any possible iation in the vote of the precincts still unreported. Minne-a and New Hampshire appeared to have gone to Hughes, but very narrow margins, the count in New Hampshire turning to son by seventy votes, with five precincts to be heard from. is placed the electoral vote on Saturday at 276 for Wilson and for Hughes, with the possibility that the twelve votes of nesota might still be added to the Wilson column. It is the sest election since 1884. The President's plurality of the ular vote exceeded 400,000. Close estimates on November 10 e Wilson 8,560,000 votes, an increase over 1912 of 2,297,000.

n the balloting for senators representatives, the Demo-ts retained control of the ate, the apparent result being election of 54 Democrats and Republicans, giving a Demo-tic majority of 12 as against 16 the present Senate; in the use, 217 Republicans and 210 nocrats had been surely elected the 13th with one other Re-blican a probable winner in his trict, which indicated that the House would stand Repub-ns 218, Democrats 212, Pro-ssive one, Prohibitionist one, tectionist one, Independent e, Socialist one, and one doubt-. This result gives neither rty control of the House, and ows the balance of power into hands of the five representa-es of minor parties. In the sent House the Democratic jority is 23.

It is impossible at this writing tell just what forces were re-onsible for the reelection of the esident. The President's party d counted on the labor vote, t Hughes ran strong in the eat labor centers, which have mained Republican as they have en before, with the exception of io, which was practically con-ded to Wilson before the elec-n. There was much question to the probable action of men voters, yet in most cases ey seem to have divided also.

A GREAT deal was said during the campaign regarding the vote of citizens of foreign birth, yet the returns give no evidence of any large movement of such citizens en bloc to either candidate. The Republican chairman in Kansas, which State, while a very independent commonwealth with a strong Progressive trend, has usually been safely Republican, but which this year elected a Republican governor and the entire Republican state ticket by pluralities ranging to 100,000, yet gave its vote to Wilson by 25,000, is reported to have said, "We appealed especially for help for Hughes and the congressmen, but $1.75 wheat and the 'Kept us out of war' cry and the Adamson Law made it impossible for us to turn the tide."

Much was made during the campaign by the Democrats out of the criticism by the Republicans and their candidate of the President's Mexican policy, the declaration being made and pressed home that a vote for Hughes by all the logic of the occasion meant a vote for war. The action of the Republican committee in California in permitting Mr. Hughes to attend a banquet served by non-union waiters during a strike of union waiters, and the action of the same committee in preventing candidate Hughes from meeting the Progressive governor, Hiram Johnson, during the campaign for the nomination for senator, may perhaps have thrown the balance against the Republican ticket in both California and Washington; for California's progressivism antedated the convention of 1912, was based more thoroughly on cardinal principles than that of much of the country, and the Progressives of California, as of other Western states, showed less tendency to permit themselves to be led back into the Republican fold than did those of other sections. As it transpires, the state of California has decided the election, and the city of San Francisco has decided the result in California; so that it may be said that the city by the Golden Gate has for once in its career elected a President of the United States. The old question which was paramount throughout the campaign, as to whether the disruption of the old Republican party at Chicago in 1912 had been repaired in Chicago in 1916, is still open. "Peace and prosperity," the spirit of "let well enough alone," a hatred of war, and a fear that a change of administration might precipitate a conflict somewhere, all were elements in the decision of the electors.

The total vote of the Socialist party is given at about a million and a half. The total vote for the Prohibition party is not available at this writing. Of seven states that voted on prohibition, Michigan, Montana, South Dakota, Utah and Nebraska were carried by the "dry" forces. Missouri remained under its present law, as did California, and an attempt to repeal the prohibition law in Arkansas failed by a large vote. Attempts in Washington, Iowa and Colorado to modify or repeal prohibition acts were likewise defeated. The governor elected in Florida is said to be pledged to sign a prohibition bill if passed, and the legislature is reported as favorable to the measure. Utah chose prohibition by electing a legislature pledged to enact state-wide prohibition. There having been eighteen prohibition states, the addition of these five brings the total number of "dry" states in the Union to twenty-three, with the possibility that Florida will be added by legislative action before the end of the year. Woman suffrage amendments were defeated in the states of South Dakota and West Virginia.

The vote on Tuesday, November 7, crossed party lines with such utter abandon that even the most skilful politicians will still be figuring as to what it meant when the next election is held. From appearances it would seem that the day of blind allegiance to party has passed in America. The independent voter, whose number has been increasing year by year, is now in the saddle. He holds the balance of power. This is indeed well, for it means that any party which would retain control of the machinery of government must serve the people, must keep its promises, and must represent in its policies the firm convictions of the electorate. Campaigns will not be won again on catching slogans. The people

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS SEVENTH LETTER

An Interview with Viscount Kaneko

I HAVE just had a most illuminating and interesting interview with Viscount Kaneko, one of the leading statesmen of Japan. He is at present a member of the Privy Council, of which Prince Yamagata is now president, though Viscount Kaneko held that position from 1888 to 1890.

Like Marquis Okuma, he is a native of Kyushu. He is now sixty-three years old. He has spent eight years in America, getting his degree from Harvard in the class of 1878, and holding as well an honorary LL.D. from that institution. He represented Japan unofficially during the Russo-Japanese War, at which time he was a warm friend of Theodore Roosevelt. He has served his own country as secretary to Prince Ito, when that leader was premier; as chief secretary of the House of Peers; as Vice-Minister, and later, as Minister of Agriculture and Commerce; and Minister of Justice. At the present time he is president of the American Friends' Society, and is one of the foremost authorities on Americo-Japanese relations.

Viscount Kaneko is unusually frank and open in his statements, and my visit of over an hour was a most pleasant one. The room in which I was received was simply but tastefully furnished, with less furniture than we would have in a parlor. To the Japanese, a foreigner's home looks like a second-hand furniture store.

Facing me as I entered was a photograph of Theodore Roosevelt presented to Viscount Kaneko when he was a Baron, during his two-year visit to America in 1904-05. In a small alcove, where the ivory-colored statue stood out boldly from a dark background, was a fine Venus di Milo. A portrait of the former Emperor, a Japanese motto and a portrait of Mr. Kaneko completed the decorations.

An Oriental Statesman at Home

All through the interview, I could look past the simple, unassuming, slightly bald man, who talked so fluently and openly, to the rather stiff portrait of the same man in full military costume, with gold lace and decorations on his breast. I was glad that he was dressed as he was, in the simple gray costume of the Japanese gentleman at home. We talked as man to man. No one has made me feel more at ease, yet without loss of dignity. Viscount Kaneko would make a very poor chum, but he would be an admirable friend.

He hoped that I was not unduly praising the Japanese, feeling that such an attitude was not that of the truest friendship.

"Every nation has its faults," he said; "and unless a writer admits faults in those whom he describes, his readers know he is not stating facts, but trying to prove something or to confuse his readers. I am very careful, in speaking of Americans, not to overlook their faults, but that makes the more forceful my statements of their frankness, straightforwardness, charity and altruism. The Japanese respect and like the American people, in spite of the scalawags that are found there."

Viscount Kentaro Kaneko

"Scalawag" is a favorite word with the Viscount. When it is not an American scalawag it is a Japanese scalawag. Mr. Kaneko is not given to slang, but "scalawag" is an important word in his vocabulary. We talked of many things, and after thoroughly discussing mission work and Christian schools, he spoke very openly of political matters—so openly that I am not permitted to quote his statements—but in a way that opened new vistas in my grasp of the situation, and convinced me not only of the sincerity and integrity of the small but virile man opposite me, but threw new light on the difficulties in which Japan finds herself, and argued well for her desire to maintain not only our friendship, but China's as well.

I admitted my prejudice against Japan while I was in China a year and a half ago, and was unable to say that that prejudice was entirely dispelled; but the words of Viscount Kaneko did much to efface a prejudice which had its inception, as many prejudices do, in partizanship and ignorance. I am absolutely convinced that if the best men in Japan can have their way in the government, there will exist no reason for any one's doubting the statement, so often and so recently made, that Japan will carry out to the letter the very clearly expressed treaties she has made.

A Japanese View of Christian Missions

I realize that some of my friends, on readin will say that shrewd politicians have blinded me iniquity of the Japanese empire. My missi Japan has been published in the papers, and the have known my every move; yet there has not a single attempt made to make me see matters th Japanese eyes, or to keep me from seeing thing American eyes. I sought the interview with Vis Kaneko, having a letter of introduction from our broadest churchmen in America. I have dence in Dr. Mathews, and I have confidence a Viscount Kaneko; and these men base their judg on more inside information than is possessed by jingoists in both countries.

I am not sure that Japan's actions in Chin satisfy the United States, or that they will be en just. But I do believe that many broad-gauge s men in Japan, among them Viscount Kanek working with might and main to bring about rel that will be honorable and friendly. The fran with which the Viscount discussed delicate m in politics gave value to what he said, and to I am free to quote, about Christian mission in Japan for the last half century.

Viscount Kaneko is not a Christian. Wh America he was a close friend of Phillips Brooks, man Clark, Edward Everett Hale and Bishop In search of the truth, he visited every church i ton, from Baptist and Metho Unitarian and Swedenborgian the impression left on his min one of confusion and discord. I asked him whether he might become a Christian if Christ been in Boston he thought h doubtedly would.

Although he considers Bud a superior philosophy, he be that Christianity is superior life; and seeing it advance, wi ministers respected, while Bud declines and its priesthood is l down upon, he is doing all i power to extend the influen Christianity in Japan. Missio testify that his influence is a help in Christian work.

According to Mr. Kaneko, tianity was at a low ebb in Japa ing his boyhood, owing to the bi and poor education of the mi aries. They came from China, and America and treated the J ese as inferiors.

"Some of the missionaries much less educated than the p they tried to reach," said th count. "This condition I expl to my friends in America on visits, pleading for men of education in addition to sem training. The present missionaries are much su in this respect, and are not only gentlemen but a equals in secular education. But the missiona Japan is not dealing with South Sea Islande Chinese of the coolie class. Mission boards s continually strengthen their demands for a training on the part of the men they send to J for there are Japanese today, as there were i school days, who will sneer at Christ becau

He is bound to encounter those ıis work who are better educated ecular lines than he is, and who know For this reason, the native preachers Christian workers should be persons only of broad sympathies but of broad ing."

e discussed the Christian schools and influence. The Viscount believes ughly in Christian schools, though are inferior to the Imperial University aching staff, equipment and student .

Aside from the Imperial University, h has the pick of the finest students," xplained, "Christian schools are equal e government schools. That is to say, are four or five colleges that are so, les many elementary schools.

Given two students, one from a Chris- school and the other from a govern- t school, having the same scholarship training, our best business and profes- al men will choose the graduate of a stian school on account of his superior ality. Those boys are honest, and they straight without being told. Chris- ity is proving its value by the men it luces, and we cannot have too many istian schools of government standard apan."

iscount Kaneko had kept in mind the ous points he had made, and before turning to a ussion of politics, he summed them up to give me ance to get them clearly in mind.

Friendship recognizes faults, but triumphs over n. Christian leaders must be well trained to do tive work in Japan. On account of the high acter of the graduates of Christian schools in an, our men are very friendly toward Christian ools. Christianity is a practical religion, and is spreading among our best men in all walks of life wildfire, while Buddhism is on the decline. But higher a place Christianity wins, the better and der should be its leaders. Japan will never ask istians to compromise on their faith, if they have heir representatives men whose training is broad, whose manners are those of gentlemen dealing equals," he concluded.

t is significant that Viscount Kaneko made his ointment with me by telephone. It shows to what ent his stay in America influenced our interview. had time to give me more than an hour, and hence discussion was franker and fuller than my further rviews are likely to be. The Viscount has asked to call on him again when I am in Tokyo.

s Viscount Kaneko, with the honorable record I e outlined, intelligent enough and honest ugh to speak truths that are worth giving d to, or have I been treated to a dish of soft p in an effort to deceive my readers? I have opinion. You are entitled to yours.

A Motorcyclist's Perils

ly last week has been occupied with a ty- oon, a motorcycle and nine million people whose main desire is to stand in the way when I try to ride through a narrow street. The horn on my machine makes more noise than that on any auto in Japan. If I were walking in the street and that thing went off within ten rods of me, I'd jump for the nearest shelter and do it quickly. Not so the Japanese. One would think that being run over was their main delight. From Yokohama to Tokyo, the road is almost a continuous double row of open-faced houses, which disgorge their occupants just before a vehicle wants to use the road. One might get the idea from pictures that Japan is sparsely populated; but there are more people along that Yokohama-Tokyo road than there are in the New York Subway at six P. M. I never saw so much concentrated humanity outdoors in my life.

Freight and coal yards at Otaru where 500 tons of coal an hour can be shot into a ship's hold

I can get a hundred Japanese lined up in front of my machine any time I start the engine. After a few hundred little imps race directly in front of one, waving their arms and skidding along on their clogs, he makes up his mind to wipe out a few of them to show that a three-hundred-and-fifty pound machine with a two-hundred-pound rider is not a thing to be toyed with.

But just then, out into your path runs the cutest little girl that ever had her coal-black hair cut around a bowl; wearing a bright-colored dress and looking at you with all the trust that can be shown in two big dark eyes, and your heart goes into your mouth before her mother snatches her out of the way.

Riding a power bike in Japan is hard on the nerves. You can't speak the language to ask the way. You can't read the signs. You can't find out what is the matter with your machine without some inquisitive apprentice bringing along his hundred-piece foundry to see what is inside the thing. They are becoming fairly used to autos, but a late-model bike makes them just die to turn a few screws and examine the very vitals of the curiosity.

Every grown man seems to have a cart a few inches narrower than the road. Two of these carts are perpetually meeting just in front of you. Or you blow your horn at a peasant drawing his load of bamboo poles, and he turns out violently, thrusting the harsh bamboo like a shaving brush under your chin so that you only get past by a close shave.

I called on our consul in Yokohama, Mr. George H. Scidmore, who told me that there is no discrimination against American shippers in Japan, as far as he knew. Freight rates are high, but that is due to a shortage of ships. Sometimes a shipping clerk will, for friendship or its monetary equivalent, reserve space in a certain steamer for his client; but there is no concerted action to keep foreigners from trading on an equal footing.

Mr. Scidmore's mother is ninety-three years old and her Sabbath is spent in reading the Christian Herald, as it has been for many years. She is in good health and the possession of all her faculties, thus proving that life abroad is not always terminated prematurely.

"You can tell your readers," he added, "that there is not a more enthusiastic subscriber on the lists than Mrs. Scidmore. She reads the whole paper, is very fond of Frank Carpenter's articles, and reads the sermons two or three times."

Sidelights of Japanese Character

I want to tell two incidents to illustrate Japanese character. They prove nothing. They do not show how many warships we should build next year; nor do they make out that the Japanese are angels or devils. They are incidents—that is all.

A bright young fellow stepped up to me and asked, "Do you consider that my English is very good for Japanese boy?" He was a stranger to me, but his face was beaming with pride at his possession of a language that means a lot in Japan. I admitted that his English was fair. Immediately he asked if I would help him with a difficult bit of English that he was trying to explain to his smaller brother. Of course I consented. I thought he was going to take me into the shade across the street, so I went along. But it turned out that his book was nearly a mile away. When we reached his place and it turned out to be a curio shop, I thought that if a man tried to sell me a gold brick I would buy it.

But contrary to my expectations, he neither mentioned curios nor lingered behind the counter. He took me back to a desk where there was an English book in words of one syllable, and the most involved idioms that a despairing teacher ever tried to explain to one whose English, "very good" as it was "for a Japanese boy," lacked a few pinnacles of completion.

It was all about Mr. Henry and Mr. Becket. I have taught that story with variations in

Wu Ting Fang

New head of Chinese foreign office

HE MAY FIND THE WAY OUT. Wu Ting Fang, who was Chinese minister to the United States for a number of years and whose hunger for knowledge and promiscuous asking of questions, prompted by the desire to fathom the mysteries of Western civilization, kept him in the public eye and made him the center of many more or less humorous incidents, has been appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese republic. Minister Wu has been in sympathy with the Chinese revolution from the start, is one of China's strongest men, rendered her good service as minister to this country, and is expected to acquit himself well in solving the mysteries and untangling the perplexing situations which confront her in her foreign relations.

PRICE UP, COST DOWN. The Federal Trade Commission announced on November 3 that its investigation of news-print paper prices had developed that the average cost of production was less than a dollar and a half for a hundred pounds, which is below the average cost in the last three years, while the price since January 1 has risen from two dollars per hundred pounds to six or seven dollars in some instances. The production in the first half of 1916 was very much greater than in any preceding half-year since 1913, most mills operating twenty-four hours a day for six days a week.

DEATH STALKS AT SEA. During one of the worst gales ever known in the Irish Sea, the British steamships Connemara and Retriever collided at sea, both vessels sinking immediately. The Retriever carried a crew of thirteen and the Connemara a crew of thirty-one and fifty passengers. Although the vessels sank near shore and were only partly submerged, the weather was so rough that it was impossible to launch boats or to extend relief from shore, and ninety-one lives were lost, some of them through the explosion of the boilers of the two ships.

INSURRECTION OR TYRANNY? Seven men were killed and forty injured in a fight on November 5 at the city wharf at Everett, Wash., between a sheriff with his posse of 150 citizens and 250 members of the Industrial Workers of the World who had sailed to Everett from Seattle on the steamer Verona in an effort to lend forcible aid to a strike of shingle weavers which they claimed had been broken by the sheriff by strong-arm methods. The sheriff had ordered all members of the organization deported from the town, an order in which he was backed by the citizens generally, the citizens organizing a vigilance committee which practically supplanted the normal government of Everett. When the Verona came alongside the pier, the sheriff is reported to have stepped forward and told the men on the boat that they would not be permitted to land. At a signal from the leader, who had begun to argue with the sheriff, his men are reported to have opened fire on the sheriff and his posse. The fire was instantly returned. Four of the killed and most of the injured were I. W. W. men. Following the incident, the governor ordered the National Guard to take control of the situation. The I. W. W. claim that they were fighting for free speech.

WILL FOLLOW IT UP. The Attorney General announced on November 3 that his department would begin an investigation into the causes for the rising cost of living, and that if any prices were being increased unlawfully prosecutions would result. The secret service of the government is reported to be giving particular attention to the coal situation. Experts of the Agricultural Department on November 3 recommended the organization of co-operative stores by consumers, the Department having made an exhaustive survey of the field for such stores and of the conditions under which they have been successful. In the meantime the climbing habit continues to be evidenced in the market prices of the nation.

CAR PLUNGES THROUGH DRAWBRIDGE. A Boston street railway car plunged through an open drawbridge into Fort Point Channel on November 7. The motorman, who jumped in time to save his life, claimed that warning lights were missing on the gates barring the open draw. At least forty-five persons lost their lives. Twelve were rescued.

AN INTERNATIONAL EVIL. In enforcing the Harrison Drug Law, American police officials have found that the addiction to drugs is by no means confined to the underworld, the use being even wider than was suspected when the law was passed. Great Britain has recently adopted restrictions on the drug traffic modeled very closely on the Harrison Law. Under the new English regulations it is illegal for any unauthorized person to have cocain in his possession, and for a chemist to supply it except on the written order of a physician.

NOT SO WILD AFTER ALL. According to a letter from Dr. Carl Lumholtz, a Norwegian traveler, published in the London Daily Chronicle, he has been meeting with some strange experiences amid the untamed mountains and rushing torrents of the island of Borneo. He says the mountain peoples are a quiet, hardy people of nomadic habits, who have lately been induced to form villages and cultivate rice. According to this traveler, it is the custom among them for a young man to pay for his bride with a sword or a gun, there being no marriage ceremony. Divorce is very rare. If the husband dies, the widow fasts every other day for a month, and is expected to weep morning and evening for one year, at the end of which period she is allowed to remarry. The chiefs among these tribes are permitted to wear a tiger's tooth inserted in a hole, made by forcing through an empty rifle cartridge, in the upper part of each ear. The writer reports that the head-hunting part of the native religion has been practically suppressed by Dutch influence, and that, apart from this custom, the Dyaks have many good qualities. They are gentle, trustworthy and industrious, and theft is unknown among them.

WILL TEST THE EIGHT HOUR LAW. A suit was filed on November by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the United States District Court at Omaha, Neb., to test the constitutionality of the Adamson eight-hour law, alleging that it is not a proper regulation of interstate commerce, violates the guarantees of the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and is unworkable as applied to existing conditions.

FOR GRADED FLOUR. The Woman's Association of Commerce, which is pressing a fight against the high cost of bread flour, is urging the United States Department of Agriculture to put into effect at once a law (effective July 1, 1917) which provides for the fixed and uniform grading of wheat. The women also urge that flour milled from the different grades of wheat shall bear the number of the wheat from which it is milled, it having been demonstrated that bread made from the three inferior grades of flour was fully as nutritious as that made from Grade 1. The Association declares that as wheat is now handled, lower grades are mixed with the higher and all are sold as Grade No. 1, or the inferior grades are rejected and fed to stock.

THE INDIAN NO LONGER VANISHING. Vital statistics prepared by the Bureau of Indian Affairs show that the Indians in the United States are again increasing in number. For three years unusual efforts have been made to instruct the Indian in matters of hygiene, in the care of children, especially of young babies, and in the prevention of disease. The results have been shown in cleaner homes and in better general health, and are now registered in the statistics for the fiscal year 1916, which include all Indians except the five civilized tribes and a few scattered Indians in California. The total Indian population is given as 20924, the total births 6,092, total deaths 4,572, the increase being 1,520.

EXTRACT OF SAWDUST FOR MOTOR CARS. Undeterred by the ancient tale of the man who fed his faithful horse on sawdust, chemists of the American Chemical Society declare that it will soon be possible to run motor cars on alcohol derived from sawdust. It is claimed that alcohol may also be produced from other by-products of industry, and that the southern darky may lose his "black strap" molasses as a result of the demand of industry and pleasure for a cheaper fuel than gasoline. It is claimed that alcohol can be produced from these and other by-products and retailed for twenty-five cents a gallon; and be preferable to gasoline at the same price.

FOR ARGOSIES OF PEACE. In the first six months of 1916, 192 vessels aggregating 228,000 gross tons, were launched in the United States, and on July 1 American shipyards were building or had orders to build 385 steel merchant ships, of which 159 were expected to be

Prince Leopold of Bavaria

Probable king of new Poland

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE most important political event of the week, and perhaps, indeed, in one sense, of the war so far, was the reestablishment of the historic kingdom of Poland on November 5. Poland, whose national existence was stifled over a century ago, once more resumes her place in the family of nations.

This, irrespective of the ultimate result of the war; since it is to be presumed that, even should the Allies win a complete victory, in view of their oft-repeated declarations of concern for the interests of small nations, and particularly of their championship of right for the sake of right, they will not undo this act of historic justice.

For generations the several partitions of Poland have been looked upon as the greatest violations of right by might in modern history. Presumably, from another announcement made on the same day by the Emperor of Austria, the Austrian province of Galicia will in due course be handed over to this newly revived, though ancient, kingdom. Necessarily, all the details of this revival are not fully settled, but the principle is laid down that the government of the revived nation is to be a hereditary and constitutional monarchy, under a sovereign still to be selected.

The following figures of French losses were given to Gustave Le Bon, the well-known French publicist, by the Commission of the Army of the French Chamber of Deputies, and constitute the first authentic statistics on this subject which have come under my notice. The French loss in killed and dead of wounds from the beginning of the war up to February 15, 1915, was 186,541; to May 1, 1915, 327,106; to February 1, 1916, 605,317; in wounded for the total period, 974,191; in missing, 391,000—a total casualty list of 1,970,508. Since this date there have elapsed eight months, in which occurred, in addition to the ordinary or routine casualties, those in the defense of Verdun, the present Picardy offensive, and the Salonica expedition.

General von Beseler

Probable prime minister of new Poland

The government of the United States has made representations to the government of France, touching on the use of the word "American" in connection with the volunteer corps of aviators in the French army, mostly composed of citizens of the United States, designed to bring about a cessation of such use, obviously improper as long as the United States remains officially a neutral nation.

The number of mail pouches seized by Great Britain since the war began on the voyages to or from Germany now has reached the total of 41,000.

THE Verdun front again came into prominent notice when, on Thursday night, November 2, the Germans without hindrance evacuated Fort Vaux, to the east of the Meuse River. The Germans explained that since the recapture of the ruins of Fort Douaumont by the French, Fort Vaux no longer justified, in its dismantled condition, the sacrifices which would be necessary to retain it, it being ill adapted for defense against attacks from the south and west. The fort was completely destroyed, as a fort, before evacuation. The next day the ruins were taken possession of by the French, who in the course of the next couple of days extended their lines to include the villages of Vaux and Damloup. It seems probable that the Germans will make no further effort to take this French fortress.

On the Picardy front on November 2 the French made a slight advance during the day between Les Bœufs and Sailly-Saillisel, north of the Somme, and took a couple of hundred prisoners in so doing.

Next day north of the Somme the French recaptured from the Germans the houses in Sailly-Saillisel which the latter had possessed themselves of a couple of days before. East of Gueudecourt the British also captured a German trench, but further south a French attack on the northern portion of St. Pierre Vaast was repulsed by the Germans.

On Saturday the British made a slight advance near the Butte de Warlencourt. The French became more active and launched an attack on the whole line from Les Bœufs to St. Pierre Vaast wood, and succeeded, during the night, in pushing their line forward several hundred yards toward Le Transloy, in capturing part of the village Saillisel, east of Sailly-Saillisel, and in much harder fighting in St. Pierre Vaast wood, taking the German defenses of the northern horn of the wood as well as their trenches on the wood's south-western outskirts.

Sunday night, however, there was really hard fighting north of the Somme, and it was very fierce on that part of the front extending from Sailly-Saillisel south to St. Pierre Vaast wood and around the Butte de Warlencourt, on the British portion of the front. The Germans attacked the French positions and succeeded in gaining ground in the village of Saillisel itself and also in St. Pierre Vaast wood, but were repulsed on the other sections of this line. The Germans captured some 400 prisoners and eleven machine guns in addition to the gain in ground.

Rain prevailed along all the western front on Tuesday, but there was hard fighting nevertheless. To the south, the French attacked on the two-and-one-half mile front extending southward from a point a little to the northwest of the village of Ablaincourt, to the outskirts of the wood slightly northwest of Chaulnes, and were successful in their attack. The villages of Ablaincourt and Pressoire, a short mile to the southwest, were taken, and the rush of the French advance enabled them to establish themselves in the cemetery and sugar refinery to the southeast of Ablaincourt. After this fighting the weather grew much worse, and the rest of the week was quiet except for artillery activity.

Poland, Past and Present

The newly created kingdom occupies the territory shown above in cross checking "Poland as constituted in 1815." The imperial manifesto recreating the Kingdom of Poland was read in the ancient capital of Warsaw, in the square before the castle of the Polish kings, by Governor General von Beseler. It was greeted with cheers, hailed with demonstrations of joy and celebrated in parades. Mass meetings expressed to the emperors the gratitude of the Poles.

After the Election

ELECTION is over and the country is to be congratulated on its patience and self-restraint under a very trying ordeal. For the first time in forty years it has found itself facing an outcome so close and inconclusive as to make it practically impossible to ascertain definitely and satisfactorily the verdict of the nation at the polls, except by a recount in the doubtful states.

For two days this uncertainty prevailed, and it was not until November 10, two full days after the election, that the whole country felt relieved by the announcement that a definite result had been reached. The states of California, New Mexico and North Dakota had been conceded to the Democrats. This still left the votes of Minnesota and New Hampshire in doubt, but they could not affect the result.

Doubtless there are many good Americans who will be unable to regard the popular verdict as a strong and unqualified expression of approval of many things that have happened in the last four years. They, with many others, have felt the strain of situations that might have been avoided by wiser diplomacy and better administrative foresight. Ours is a big country, with a great destiny. This nation should not only seek but it should maintain the respect of other nations. Our administrative policies should be conciliatory and just; but while disposed to peace with all the world, they should be firm and unspoiled by vacillation, once they are formulated. Our flag should be accorded everywhere the honorable recognition which is its due, throughout the globe. In our domestic affairs, the scales of administration should be held so evenly that it could never be said that one class of citizens was benefited at the expense of another class. And it should be the earnest effort of our government to weld the whole American people into one loyal body of citizens, native, foreign-born and those of foreign descent, all on the same equal footing—all of them Americans as sound and loyal as the best of us. There should be no more divisions, no more hyphenated line, but a policy which would include a sincere effort to unite all in one common national interest. These are the broad lines on which our nation was built, and any administration which departs from this standard does violence to the national spirit and to the most valued traditions of our people.

On the whole, then, we may see good coming out of the close election—good in the sense of a lesson and some very practical suggestions to those who are again called to the duties of administration, and who can bring to the performance of these duties a riper judgment and a larger experience. The result should also admonish Congress that the people look to their representatives to act with a larger and broader independence of party lines in serving the nation's interests, and especially that they should resent any attempts at dictatorship, either in regard to domestic or foreign policies. The people are the supreme power and Congress represents them. And it should not be forgotten that the people are bigger than President, Cabinet and Congress.

The future is ripe with promise. The loyal American people look forward trustfully and hopefully to four years of continued peace and prosperity under an Administration which, having passed through a severe ordeal, has profited by the experience, and which should increasingly strive to deserve the loyal support and confidence of all classes of the country.

One Day's Rest in Seven

THE Lackawanna Steel Company, which employs about 7,000 men, has made request of the New York State Industrial Commission for exemption from the observance of the law requiring one day's rest in seven for its workers. Such request is without a precedent. There are very valid reasons why the Industrial Commission should not assume the responsibility of granting to this Lackawanna Steel Company, or to any other industrial concern, the right to override and disregard the law establishing a rest day. It bases the request upon the power of the Industrial Commission to grant exemption from the law when conditions arise which result in "practical difficulties or necessary hardship"; but nowhere does it show the existence of conditions which are not common to the steel industry at all times, which fact was well known to the legislature when it passed the law. Therefore, what the Lackawanna Company really asks for is the nullification of the law; and further, as though it were a mere incident, the nullification of the oldest statute in the world on the rest day: the Fourth Commandment.

We submit that no Commission on earth has the power to do this, even if it is not a part of the organic law of a state.

There are other considerations which enter into the question. When business was not so pressing as now, the company found it quite practicable to observe the law. Now, in an unusually busy season, rather than increase its facilities, it prefers to supply the larger output through continuous operations. The men are not a slave gang, but American workmen; and in their behalf we repeat that they should not be worked continuously. Considerations of health and well-being, as well as respect of the law, convince us that this attitude is the right one. They should have one day's rest in seven. Besides, if it were within the power of the Industrial Commission to grant the concession asked—which it is not—it would not be long before other industries would ask for similar exemption.

Seven days' labor has been condemned by practically all who have given the question serious thought—legislators, social workers, workingmen, churchmen, physicians and employers. Even the English government, which is turning out its vast supply of munitions to keep up the waste of war, found after due inquiry that it was imperative that the workers should have a weekly day of rest. Surely if such a decision was reached by a country which is engaged in the greatest struggle of its existence, a nation at peace can find no justification for taking an opposite course. The lure of added profits would not justify breaking down the lives and morals of the workers. Even a machine needs rest for repair and reinvigoration. Is not a man worth at least as much consideration as a piece of machinery?

And what of the social life of the worker who labors continuously without a rest day? What opportunity has he to develop as a citizen, a father, a husband, a churchman? Is he a mere beast of burden, or a human being with an immortal soul to save? We cannot believe that it has ever entered into the minds of those making the proposition that it would be a gross injustice to American labor to grant this request. It is not to the point that some of the men have the right to work seven days if they prefer. The law of "personal liberty" is a good law only when it does not interfere with the rights of others to their injury; in other words, the individual must give way to the superior claim of society, and the state must protect the best interests of its people as a whole, and even protect the individual against himself.

We think it would be an excellent thing for the readers of the Christian Herald in New York State to send individual protests to the state legislature at Albany against the granting of the request for the exemption of any industrial concern from observing the law requiring one day's rest in seven for its workingmen.

Preaching Christ

PREACHING only opinions is feeding the people on husks, but proclaiming convictions of Gospel truth or real soul experiences is feeding the flock with the bread of life. Refined human theories, moral essays, mere speculations, seasoned with doubts, are not drawing cards to attract a congregation. In his immortal addresses, Jesus never indulged in opinions. He proclaimed facts, truths, verities, with absolute certainty of their reliability. He left no uncertainty in the minds of his hearers. He said, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life. He that believeth on me shall have everlasting life."

Positiveness is the power of all great preaching; guesses and possibilities are not pillows for the repose of the soul. The minister is God's ambassador, not with plenipotentiary powers or discretionary license, but with the unchangeable written words of the terms of peace between God and his wandering children. Therefore, he must be overwhelmingly certain that he knows the divine will and is proclaiming it without fear or favor.

Men who are dealing in immortal futures cannot afford to make a mistake; they must win or lose forever. No faithful messenger of God would put to the parched lips of dying men his own milk-and-water mixture of opinions, when the elixir of life from the cup of salvation is extended by the hand of the Great Physician. Preachers who do not know that Christ has saved them, commissioned them and endued them with the Holy Spirit's power should "tarry until"; they should wait for the promise of the Father and get the vision of the glory of God in the face of Chrst.

Those who preach their doubts about the virgin birth generally need the new birth; those who see only the human side of the Master need a look at the Godward side, that they may cry out, "My Lord and my God!"

The soul cares little for theories; it calls ev fo facts. We must know! We must feel! We mu se him who is invisible. The agnostic is the blind le lin the blind to the abyss. When the preacher ha seen the face of God in Christ, his whole presence be me electric with power; men are convinced when e i speaking the truth as it is in Jesus.

It is said that Daniel Webster, while spendi th summer in New Hampshire, attended service er Sabbath in the little country church. His niece ke him why he went there when he paid little atte io to far abler sermons in Washington. He re ied "In Washington they preach to Daniel Webst th statesman; but this man has been telling I nie Webster the sinner of Jesus of Nazareth, an ha been helping him." The minister who preaches ris crucified on the cross of Calvary, dying for los world, is helping to draw all men unto him.

The Farmers' Opportunity

THERE probably never was a time when th cal of the land to young men was more insis tl sounded than today. Farmers' legit at profits are higher than ever in the country's hi ry And this is not due alone to the fact that two ar of foreign war have vastly increased the dema fo American foodstuffs, mainly farm products; but er has been for nearly a decade a growing tenden to better and more profitable agriculture here than ve before. If we look at the steadily ascending c o living in the last twenty-four months, and her glance ahead at the immediate prospect for the co ing year, it will be found that few industries come i the same profitable remunerative classification with hat of agriculture.

In an instructive pamphlet on economic condi ns issued a few days ago by the National City Ba of New York—the largest financial institution i the world—it is foreshadowed that "this country an the whole world are entering upon a year of scarcity and probably the highest prices for food product experienced by the present generation." This pro ect it regards as deplorable from every viewpoint and one which cannot be mitigated "until relief is aff ded by a more abundant yield of the common necessi s." Our wheat crop is over 50,000,000 bushels sm ller than the crop of 1915, while Canadian whe is 211,000,000 bushels short of last year; and the ops of Argentina, France, Italy, Australia and Ind all run about 25 per cent. below. Taking into consi ration our enormous export not only in wheat, b in corn, butter, eggs, meats, wool and cotton, it uld seem very clear that unless production is gr tly stimulated, high prices must continue to pr ail. There is no other way out of the difficulty. Fe ral or legislative investigating committees may g all over the ground, consuming time and the patien of the public; but the short road to a solution is hat which has been indicated. The pamphlet says o his point:

> There is a scarcity today of wheat, corn, potatoes, ats. cotton and wool. They are all bringing almost fabulous pes. but the prices cannot increase the supply, except as the ay check the movement of young men away from the farm nto railroading and other occupations. Wages in the citi can never advance fast enough to keep pace with the cost of l ng. if the movement from farm to city continues. There is a ort-age of labor on the farms. It is made up in part by the e of labor-saving machinery.
> In the last analysis what is wanted is not more job but more things: more grain, more meat, more potatoes, ore materials for clothing, more materials for houses, large and better houses, more comforts in the houses, etc., etc., and ere is no hope of supplying these wants except by more ef ent industry. Instead of making each job occupy as many w ers as possible, we want each man's work to be as product as possible. If this idea, of the public interest in the multi ca-tion of products, instead of the multiplication of jobs, co be made dominant, industry would be revolutionized. The igh cost of living would come tumbling down, and the pr em how we can keep our factories running after the war uld be solved.

This is the agriculturist's era of opportu ty. Increased production would mean increased re rn, possibly at a slightly lowered ratio than at pre nt, but netting far better results as a whole. Besides he farmer, by stimulating production to the hi est practical point for next season, would be doi a great deal of good, and indeed would be a benef or to the whole country, bringing down prices, suppl ng ample food for domestic consumption, and win ng the gratitude and blessing of our entire populatic

Virginia Now Under Prohibition

THE prohibition law passed by the Virginia legislature some time ago did not take effect till midnight of October 31. Then the Old Dominion became the eighteenth state to the sale of ntoxicating liquors, completing a area in the South reaching from Washington acksonville to the east, and to New Orleans e west. Although a large part of the state gone dry in local option elections, the new closed more than 800 saloons, mostly in mond, Norfolk, Newport News, Lynchburg, rsbug, Roanoke, and Bristol. The law is one e most drastic ever passed by a state legisla-. Cripple Saves Six Lives

WALLACE FREELAND, twenty-two years old, a cripple from infantile paralysis e infancy, at two o'clock the other morning gged himself along to a fire alarm box in rytown, N. Y., and by giving the alarm was to save six children in the apartment house which he lived. Freeland was aroused by ke filling his room, and crawled down stairs l to the box. The fire was burning briskly n the firemen arrived, and the six children l to be carried out. Emergencies often develop highest qualities. The fire revealed a real o in the cripple. He will have the satisfac- to the end of his days of having saved the s of six precious children. Christ had to lose own life to save others, to save us. How ht we to live for him who died for us? The ostle thus enforces this lesson: "And that he d for all, that they which live should not ceforth live unto themselves, but unto him ich died for them, and rose again." (II Cor. 15.)

ficially Promotes French Farming

HE French government the last of October officially designated a commission for eloping the use of agricultural machinery ong the farms of France, made necessary by loss of laborers by the war. Jules Meline, Minister of Agriculture, who is pushing the tter, says: "All eyes are now turning toward marvelous mechanisms which work with a ndred times the power of a man." He calcu- es that for the invaded and devastated districts France alone there will be needed 2,000 motor trac- s, 110,000 plows, 50,000 harrows, 22,000 planters, d 15,000 reapers. Farming is the basis of all other lustries. Food is the prime necessity in peace or r. Food for the body is a type of God, the food of e soul. Of the latter Christ says: "I am that bread life." (John 6 : 48.)

Pulitzer Prizes at Columbia

RIZES amounting to $16,500 were provided for in the will of the late Joseph Pulitzer, in connec- n with the School of Journalism of Columbia niversity, New York City, which he founded. Five the prizes are to be awarded in Journalism, as follows: $1,000 for the best and most suggestive paper on the future development and improvement of the School of Journalism, or for any one idea that will promise great improvement in the operation of the school; a gold medal costing $500, for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by any American newspaper during the year; $1,000 for the best history of the services rendered to the public by the American press during the preceding year; $500 for the best editorial article written during the year, the test of excellence being clearness of style, moral purpose, sound reasoning, and power to influence public opinion in the right direction; $1,000 for the best example of a reporter's work during the year, the test being strict accuracy, terseness, and the accomplishment of some public good, commanding public attention and respect. In addition to the five prizes in journalism, four prizes in letters are to be awarded as follows: $1,000 for the American novel published during the year which shall best present the wholesome atmosphere of American life and the highest standards of American manners and manhood; $1,000 for the original American play, performed in New York, which shall best represent the educational value and power of the stage in raising the standard of good morals, good taste, and good manners; $2,000 for the best book of the year upon the history of the United States; $1,000 for the best American biography teaching patriotic and unselfish services to the people. There are five traveling scholarships of $1,500 each for travel and study in Europe. Three of these go to the School of Journalism, the fourth to the most talented musician, the fifth to the most brilliant artist. The work of all the competitors must have been done in the calendar year 1916. These prizes indicate that there is something in college besides athletics, important as that feature may be. They are a type of the prizes in the various callings of everyday life. All of these awards have a high moral as well as intellectual standard in view, and are types of the great prize of character and a happy destiny of which the apostle thus speaks: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." (Phil. 3 : 14.)

Scientist and Wife Honored at Exposition

ONE of the important events of the Electrical Exposition held at the Grand Central Palace, New York, was the celebration of "Edison Day," on October 21. Thirty-five years ago that day Mr. Edison announced to the world the invention of the incandescent electric light which has so revolutionized the lighting systems of the civilized world. The toga of the degree of LL.D., conferred on Mr. Edison by New York University the day before, was slipped over his shoulders at the celebration. Mr. Edison is America's greatest inventor, and his name will be associated with the foremost inventors through the centuries to come. A volume would be required to record the merest outline of his investigations and discoveries in the realm of electricity and chemistry and the sciences relating to them. He is a great genius, but insists that what he has accomplished has been the result of hard work. He thus emphasizes the importance of persistent toil: "The question of natural aptitude enters into the matter, and without it no man can become a star. Nevertheless, it is an auxiliary attainment; dogged perseverance is the keystone of success. In the arts, such as music, painting, poetry, a very special temperament may be required; but in the workshop of science, the man who keeps at one thing, and never minds the clock, is always sure to do something." Mr. Edison does not hesitate to declare his belief in the existence of God as seen in Nature, and in his providence. He says: "Too many people have a microscopic idea of the Creator. If they would only study his wonderful works as shown in the natural laws of the universe and in Nature herself, they would have a much broader idea of the Great Engineer and his divine power. Indeed, I can almost prove his existence by chemistry." The true man of science finds what the first verse of the Bible declares, that "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." (Gen. 1 : 1.)

Cotton Turned to Gold

IT is estimated that this year's cotton crop in the South, including the seed, will be worth a billion and a quarter dollars to the growers. Add 300,000 bales left over from previous crops, which will probably be disposed of this year, and the result will be that there will be brought into the South above $1,500,000,000 for the cotton and seed marketed this year. A billion and a half dollars for one year's cotton crop seems incredible. It is an amount several hundreds of millions of dollars above the largest ever received for cotton in the history of the nation. At the close of the Civil War the farmers of the South thought it would be well to plant their ground with general crops as well as cotton, and some prospered in so doing. Not long ago, when cotton bales were a drug on the market, scarcely bringing the cost of production, the farmers regretted they had not planted a greater area in general crops. But this year, when the cotton fields are literally gold, those who planted general crops wish they had planted the staple. The fabulous money return of the cotton yield will be an impulse to every form of industry. What a glorious New South, with its industry, its enterprise, its quickened conscience, its moral courage and its thrift! The whole nation is grateful for the one billion five hundred millions of dollars that will roll into the Southland as the cotton is carried out. The promise of agricultural prosperity to God's ancient children who served him is fulfilled to his children today: "So shall thy barns be filled with plenty." (Prov. 3 : 10.)

Carelessness a Great Enemy

THE following was originated by the Southern Pacific Company and is receiving wide currency in safety first campaigns: "I am more powerful than the combined armies of the world. I have destroyed more men than all the wars of the nations. I am more deadly than bullets, and I have wrecked more homes than the mightiest siege guns. I steal, in the United States alone, more than $500,000,000 each year. I spare no one, and I find my victims among the rich and the poor alike, the young and the old, the strong and weak. Widows and orphans know me. I loom to such proportions that I cast my shadow over every field of labor, from the turning of the grindstone to the moving of every railroad train. I massacre thousands of wage-earners in a year. I lurk in unseen places and do most of my work silently. You are warned against me, but you heed not. I am relentless. I am everywhere—in the home, on the streets, in the factory, at railroad crossings and on the sea. I bring sickness, degradation and death, yet few seek to avoid me. I destroy, crush or maim. I give nothing, nothing, but take all. I am your worst enemy. I am CARELESSNESS." Carelessness works fearful damage in the spiritual realm. So many, many dear people lose their immortal souls through sheer carelessness. The avoidance of this carelessness is here suggested: "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word." (Ps. 119 : 9.)

Overcoming Evil

*A SERMON BY REV. MERCER G. JOHNSTON

TEXT Rom. 12:21. "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

THE apostle Paul was a good soldier of Jesus Christ. In this brief exhortation which is to serve as our text, are two striking characteristics of his soldiership: First, his frank recognition of his foe; second, his firm confidence in his ability to overcome that foe.

In the night in which he was betrayed, Jesus said to his disciples: "In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." Mark you, before his death, even while he stood in the shadow of the cross, that is, on the dark, earthward side of the cross—for every cross, like every darkest cloud, has its silver lining—Jesus lifted up his head out of the shadow into God's eternal sunshine, and said with exaltation, "I have overcome the world."

After his death and resurrection and ascension, speaking through the lips of the inspired writer, Jesus said: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

What a transcendent promise we have here! That you and I may sit with Christ and share his glory beneath the star-studded canopy of the throne of the King Eternal!

Unless we be of the earth earthy—unless we be "tame in earth's paddock as her prize"—unless we be mere clodhoppers—we will attend to this promise, charm the charmer never so wisely.

How are we to realize this promise?

Evidently by overcoming. The promise is "to him that overcometh," and to no other. By overcoming the world, the flesh, the devil—call it what you will: by overcoming that evil Something within a man which, with the force of gravity and the subtlety of a diabolical personality, is forever drawing man downward to the dust when he would soar upward to the sky, and tending to make of him something worse than an animal when he would be something better than an angel; by overcoming this hydra-headed evil Something, the bosom enemy of mankind, so, and only so, is the promise to be realized.

But how are we to overcome this bosom enemy of ours?

Just as Jesus did!

How, then, did Jesus overcome? In the power of the Spirit. Listen to St. Luke: "Jesus, full of the Holy Spirit, returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, during forty days being tempted of the devil. . . . And when the devil had completed every temptation, he departed from him for a season. . . . And a fame went out concerning him through all the region round about."

THE power of Jesus—I speak reverently—the power of the Man Christ Jesus lay in the fact that, having utterly given up his will, he was wholly taken up with the will and the ways of God; having utterly emptied himself of himself (as St. Paul teaches in his Epistle to the Philippians), he was utterly filled with the Spirit of God.

"I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me. . . . I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge. . . . The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing; for what things soever he doeth, these also the Son doeth in like manner." "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." These utterances point to the source and the sustenance of the overcoming power of the "strong Son of God."

To the question, How shall we work the works of God? there is but one answer, whether it be you or I or Jesus Christ that asks it, and that answer is: "Not by power, nor by might, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

If you were to ask Jesus Christ to tell you the secret of his victory over the world in the simplest possible language, he would answer you in about these words: "My Faith, my perfect faith in the presence and the power of the Spirit of God, and my perfect faith in man's ability to realize that presence and to appropriate that power and make use of it here and now. I overcome the world by being filled, through faith, with the Spirit of God."

If we would overcome, we, too, must be filled with the Spirit of God. But is that possible? you ask. The answer is: With men, no; with God, yes. For all things are possible with God. Men and women of like passions with ourselves have been filled with the Holy Spirit. We read of Zacharias and Elizabeth, of Stephen and Paul, that they were filled with the Holy Spirit. What has been, may be. Paul was not mocking us when he wrote, "Be ye filled with the Spirit." You and I may be filled with the Spirit of God.

But how are we to be filled with the Spirit of God? First, of course, by being emptied—by having our hearts emptied. You cannot fill a thing that is already full.

YOU are a lover of flowers. One day you notice the flower that has been growing in the pot in your window is fading and withering. At first you are puzzled. You say to yourself, "I have watered that flower regularly. What can be the cause of these evidences of death that I see?" The next moment you go to the flower and take up in your hand some of the earth in which it has been growing. Then you understand. And you say to the flower, "Dear flower, I know what is the matter with you. This soil in which you have been growing is all worn out; its life-giving properties are all exhausted." "Yes, perhaps so," the flower languidly replies, "but it can't be helped." "Oh, but it can!" you say; "and I'll show you how." And off you go, and in a short time return with some new, rich, loamy soil, the very sight of which ought to make the sap of the most stagnant flower stir with delight. And you say to the flower: "Now, let me empty out this old, worn-out earth, and put in this new, rich soil, and all will be well." At the sound of these words the flower seems to draw back, and say, "Oh, no! I can't give up this old soil. I am so used to it. It fits around me so snugly. I can't give it up. I want the new, but I can't give up the old. Just put the new in on top of the old." A look of sadness comes into your eyes, and you say, "I cannot do that. You must give up the old soil to make room for the new. Otherwise—you will die." And you might stand there and argue with that flower until the dirt in the pot was as dry as summer's dust, and you could not save its life, unless it consented to make room for the new soil by allowing the old to be emptied out.

We are God's flowers. God looked out from heaven and saw us, men and women, fading and withering and dying, and he had compassion on us. In the person of Jesus Christ he came down into this low world of ours—oh, the mystery of it, the loving mystery of it!—but he did. God himself did come to us through Jesus Christ; and standing before men and women just like you and me he said: "Dear flowers, dear friends, I know what is the matter with you. What you need is new soil, a new environment, made rich with the blood of my boundless love. You must be converted. Your hearts must be turned upside down, so the old soil in them can be turned out and room made for new. So shall your life be renewed. So shall you be saved." And you remember how, when Christ came and said this, many of those to whom he came drew back and said to him: "We cannot give up the old soil, the old environment, in which we have been living, to which we have become habituated. We are so used to it. We want this new soil of which you tell us, but we cannot give up the old. Just put the new soil in on top of the old." You remember how many of those to whom he came said this, even as men and women to whom he comes to-day are saying it; and you know how impossible it was and is for Christ to save those to whom he comes unless they are willing to be converted. No; Christ himself, though the wisdom of God and the power of God be in him, cannot save us unless we are willing to be converted; unless we are willing to be turned upside down, so as to get these hearts of ours emptied.

But, some one asks, of what is it that we are to be emptied? Why must we be converted? The answer is: We are to be emptied of our own ways. We must be converted in order that we may be emptied of our own ways. Solomon (he was wise) said: "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways." That is, the heart which, instead of going up gradually toward God, is sliding back day by day farther from God—downward toward the land of Nod whither Cain went from the presence of God—is a heart which is filled with its own ways. "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." Thus is it written.

THE cardinal trouble with us men and women, and the society which we compose, and which at the present moment is so discomposing to serious-minded people everywhere—so like a troubled sea—is that we are filled with our own ways, instead of with the ways of God. I do not say that our ways are altogether bad ways; but only that God's ways, as expressed in Jesus Christ, are better than our ways; better for us all that concerns us, our homes, our business, our politics our religion, everything, than our ways. Does the whole head ecclesiastical sometimes seem to be faint and the whole body politic sick, in these days in which we are living? It is because so many who profess and call themselves Christians have only tasted, and not taken, the medicine prescribed by the Great Physician for the ills that flesh is heir to.

Human society is self-centered, rather than God-centered. Our thoughts and affections are set upon ourselves, rather than upon God. Those of us who are controlled at all are, for the most part, self-controlled rather than Christ-controlled. That is, we are controlled by self for selfish ends, rather than by Christ for selfless ends. We are controlled by self in order that we may be in a better position to get more, rather than by Christ in order that we may be in a better position to give more. And this is wrong, utterly wrong. It was to set this radical error right that the Son of God "emptied himself," as St. Paul puts it; laid aside his royal robe and crown and scepter, came down from highest heaven to lowest earth, "made himself of no reputation," but took upon him the form of a servant of men, and humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, silencing every temptation to cry out against the bitterness of the cup given him to drink with this ringing declaration: "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. I will to do his will, and I shall do it, and do it heartily, even to the death."

No man attains the full dignity of true manhood, or experiences the thrill that comes with the realization of man's kinship to the King Eternal, or enters into the glorious liberty of real sonship, until, looking up to Christ, he can say:

"Thou seemest human and divine,
  The highest, holiest manhood thou:
  Our wills are ours, we know not how;
 Our wills are ours to make them thine."

Until he can say:

"Praise be thine!
I see the whole design;
I, who saw Power, see now Love perfect too:
  Perfect I call thy plan,
  Thanks that I was a man!
Maker, remake, complete; I trust what thou shalt do!
  My times be in thy hand!
  Perfect the cup as planned!
Let age approve of youth, and death complete the same!"

"TO him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne." If we would realize the promise, we must overcome. If we would overcome we must be filled with the Spirit. If we would be filled with the Spirit, we must be converted: we must be so upturned as to be emptied of that in us which is contrary and antagonistic to the Spirit: we must be willing to make ourselves of no reputation; we must be willing to lose ourselves; we must be willing to give up our wills and ways and take up the will and the ways of God. Remember, you cannot fill a thing that is already full. You cannot fill a basket with heavenly sunshine that is already full of earthly trash: and you cannot fill a human heart full of the Spirit of God which is already full of the love of that which God loves not. Mary sang: "He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich, the self-sufficient, he hath sent empty away." And Mary's Son said, "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled." Grace, says the proverb, abhors a vacuum. Christ fills all in all who love him altogether. But the fulness, let it be remembered, must be in proportion to the vacancy, in divine as well as in human love.

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne; even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne." The throne, symbol of Victory: of victory over the world, and self, and sin. But the throne symbol of more than victory. Symbol of influence, the power to help, the strong and holy right arm stretched out to save another! And such is the subtlety and strength of sin that there is probably not a home in which the influence of the throne is not needed either to uplift, or to steady, or to inspire, or to console, some member of it.

Brethren, "be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." We can do it! On this very "bank and shoal of time" we call Today, we can do it. In this certain faith, let us face without fear, and, without reproach, overcome our foe!

The Price of Liberty

SUNDAY, November 26. Mark 9 : 26. "The spirit cried and rent him sore and came out of him." And so the evil spirit was expelled, but only at the price of a great convulsion.
ritual tyrants do not relinquish their thrones thout a struggle. The pangs of emancipation e so severe that it seemed as if the escape into dom was almost worse than the misery of bondage.
d that is one of the antagonisms always encound at every crusade which seeks to serve the cause iberty. The devil cries and rends the victim sore;
l sometimes the onlookers and even the victims inclined to say, "Better to have left it alone!
ter to have borne the ills we had than pass to nething which is possibly worse!" So the remedy ms more dreadful than the disease, and the oppresn in Egypt is preferred to the hardships of the derness.

But we are never going to acquire a rich and fruit-l liberty without sore and rending struggle. There be no large emancipation without an agony. cannot loose bonds without inflicting and enduring unds. That is true in the history of peoples.
ien has a social evil been expelled without trendous struggle? When the watchword of emanciion rang through the Northern States the evil rit of slavery seated itself more firmly and sternly n its throne, and held its victims in fiercer grasp.
yranny of that order is not expelled with the ease
h which one might throw a chain out of a window.
the powers of hell are mobilized, and expulsion is earing and a raving business. How is it with the l spirit of the opium trade? Is the deliverance ng to be effected as easily and serenely as we might t up the shutters at a place of business and quietly n the key and walk away? No; there is grim fight-ahead, and the evil spirit will tear and rend us e before it is banished from the precincts of hu-nity. Or how is it with the liquor trade? Who ects a bloodless emancipation? The very threat expulsion has consolidated vested interests, and re is an agonizing struggle ahead before the evil rit will be driven from our corporate life, Evil rits never calmly accept their note of dismissal;
y fight like tigers for their lairs.

And so it is in the individual life. We cannot rchase our moral freedom as easily as we can tain a passport over a counter. It is a tremendous siness to expel a well-housed and well-established l spirit from any life. Even when the Saviour nmands the expulsion there is a fearful reluctance d a terrible clinging to its polluted throne, and a m determination to hold its sovereignty to the ry end.

But let it be noted that the evil spirit, which was ing expelled by the Lord, exerted the utmost force its destructive strength at the very moment of its pulsion. Just then, at the very instant of going t, when victory was almost attained, it threw its tim to the ground until he was as one dead. And here again the darkest hour precedes the dawn, d the deadliest struggle is just before the final

The Eternal Source of Life

MONDAY, November 27. Rev. 1 : 17, 18. "Fear not: I am the First and the Last, and the ving One." Notwithstanding his old favored miliarity with Jesus, the holy apostle fell at his et as one dead; but was recalled from his swoon the right hand of his Friend and Lord. His fears ere banished by this magnificent threefold affirman of Life: "I am the First and the Last"—Life in Eternal Source. "I am the Living One and was ad"—Life victorious over the dark powers. "And hold. I am alive for evermore"—Life as the od-Man through those happy future ages, when, the Lamb and Shepherd combined, he shall lead s people to the fountains of the water of life.
hese are majestic inspirations here! We want to e life, to experience its utmost exhilaration, to drink s brimming crystal cups, dipped from the wells of ernity. God is not against us in this, and for all ho are united with Christ there is not only Life, it Life more abundantly. "He asked life of thee, iou gavest it him; even length of days for ever and
er. Thou hast given him his heart's desire."
hey talk about the wine of life; but when men sit the banqueting-table of the Christ, they turn om the best provision of human wit and wealth, say, "Thou hast kept the best until now." Yes, it is ever so. With Christ the best is always yet to be, the last for which the first was made. F. B. M.

Teaching Our Children About God

TUESDAY, November 28. Luke 18 : 16. "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for to such belongeth the Kingdom of God." The making attractive of our religion to children has not received sufficient attention. There are many of us who remember our childhood experiences at religious services and with religious people with a certain amount of distaste. There is, to be sure, greater emphasis today upon the sunny side of Christianity; but I have sometimes wondered whether a young boy or girl would receive from us, who are Christian teachers, the correct conception of God. I have not seen for a long time a better creed of Christianity for children than the following words uttered by one whose life was a sample of his teaching:

"I would teach a child, in defiance even of reason, that God is the one Power that loves and understands him through thick and thin; that he punishes with anguish and sorrow; that he exults in forgiveness and mercy; that he rejoices in innocent happiness; that he loves courage, and brightness, and kindness, and cheerful self-sacrifice; that things that are mean, and vile, and impure, and cruel, are sad and soiling stains that he beholds with shame and tears. This, it seems to me, is the Gospel teaching about God, impossible only because of the hardness of our hearts.

"But if it were possible, a child might grow to feel about sin that it was a gate, rather than a barrier; a shadow upon the path, out of which one would pass, with such speed as one might, into the blitheness of the free air and the warm sun."

It is doubtless necessary for the modern Christian himself to get a clear and vivid conception of God in his great lovingkindness, in order to be able to make it thus clear to children. C. S. C.

Our Bodies a "Living Sacrifice"

WEDNESDAY, November 29. Rom. 12 : 1. "Present your bodies a living sacrifice." St. Francis, when dying, looked down on his emaciated body, and said, in grim pity, "I've been hard on my poor brother." But this is not what is intended by our Lord. He spoke of his body as a temple, and no reverent soul would desire that the place which God indwells should be needlessly injured or dilapidated. What a bicycle is to the cyclist, the body is in the race of life. However strong or clever the competitor for a championship may be, he will stand no chance if his wheel is out of order. And we make our power to serve the world infinitely more difficult, if we undermine our bodily health by inordinate excess, by extreme mortification, or by disregarding the great laws of health.

Bring to God for his service bodies in condition to perform the best service of which they are capable. But, of course, the body must be kept under, and its appetites strictly held under the rule of the will. Our senses all crave for inordinate gratification, to which we can give no quarter. The policy of the legislature must not be dictated by the mob. With Jesus we may say, "A body hast thou prepared for me." It has been purchased by the death of Calvary, is capable of being transfigured with glory. Present it to God that he may effect through it the highest purposes of a dedicated life. F. B. M.

Right Environment

THURSDAY, November 30. I Cor. 12 : 4. "Now there are diversities of gifts." To be in the right place, to be doing the right work, is one of the important considerations for every Christian. It is often possible for a man who has become a failure in one piece of work, to march to an amazing success in another environment. Henry Ford has the practice, in his large factory, of never discharging a man, but changing his work until the right place is found for him. It is possible for a person to go through life without discovering his or her gift, or without giving consideration to the question, "Is my particular talent rightly placed?"

We heard of a man whose friend sent him a rare plant, which was planted in a large flower-pot, near by a fountain. The plant never thrived, but lived a merely stunted life, putting out a minute foliage in the spring. Its owner was at a loss to know the trouble. One day, while he was absent from home, the gardener carelessly broke the flower-pot, tipping it, earth and all, into the waters of the fountain; and seeing that the plant had sunk to the bottom of the pool, he did not trouble to pull it out. The owner, returning some weeks later, and looking into the fountain, discovered a wonderful, luxuriant growth there, of some plant he had never before seen. Upon inquiry, he found what had happened, and it then dawned upon him that the plant was really a water plant, and that for a long time it had been starving for the want of nourishment, which it had found in the fresh water of the fountain.

It is frequently sorrow or sickness or calamity that breaks the wrong environment of our life, placing us in harmony with the things that belong to us, bringing out some latent quality within us, some unused faculty. Our life, perhaps, has needed this shock to put us in our right place.

There are indeed diversities of gifts; but there are also diversities of environment, suited to the development of these gifts. C. S. C.

Glimpsing the Invisible World

FRIDAY, December 1. II Kings 6 : 8–17. "Open his eyes, that he may see." This has been fitly described as one of those rare glimpses into the invisible world surrounding us, which adds to the dignity, grandeur, and security of our earthly life. We learn that we are encompassed by spiritual beings, who have a very direct influence on all that affects us for good or evil. The weakest is not fighting alone. In temptation and trial, when we seem hopelessly overmatched, when the Syrian hosts of our lower nature are besieging us with evil thoughts and faithless unbelief, we have only to penetrate the veil that hides from us the world which lies beyond the reach of our senses, and we shall find that there are more on our side than against us. Jacob saw them when the angels of God met him, and he said, "This is God's host." Let us claim and hold the mastery which such a vision will give us.

Let us dare to ally ourselves with these celestial forces, through our faith in him whom they acknowledge as Master. Let us be strong in the consciousness that we are not alone, but part of a great host in heaven and on earth who are advancing to victory through him that loved them. But others have not our eyes. Theirs are holden; they see not nor understand; they belong to Christ but do not recognize his presence. Let us pray for them, especially for the young, that the eyes of their heart may be opened, that they may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power toward us who believe according to the working of the strength of his might.

The unseen is greater than the seen, the permanent than the transient, the eternal good than the power of evil. F. B. M.

The Wonderful Words of Jesus

SATURDAY, December 2. John 7 : 46. "Never man spake like this man." The Jewish policemen failed to arrest Jesus. They were so captivated by his wonderful words. Christ's style of speech was simplicity itself, but his little conversational words shot home like unerring bullets, as he unveiled God the Father, man the sinner and Christ the Saviour. Behold the divine Speaker; purity mantles his face. Grace drops from his lips, love gleams from his unfathomable eyes, and his voice is as the sound of gentle waters. But his truth sticks like barbed arrows in the hearts of the King's enemies.

Jesus made no apparent effort, had no studied preparation, no training or learning of the schools. He simply opened his mouth and taught them of the majesty and glory of God. He painted word pictures called parables, using only a few strokes of his genius, and thrilling the soul with flashes of the infinite perspective. Our Lord's replies to difficult questions were given with the instantaneousness of sparks from an anvil. Making no effort at oratory, he related the parables of the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son, which will live as long as literature.

He who was the truth could paint its beauty with a stroke; he who was the way could point to the path leading to glory. He who was the Life could impart life eternal by a single sentence from his lips.

WHAT does it matter how many other times I was arrested for breaking the law or how many other prison terms I served? I've told you in detail my life to this point, simply because these events took place when I was a boy. And an uneducated, untrained and naturally wild boy of eleven or thirteen or fifteen should not be expected to reason out successfully problems as big as my problems were. It isn't reasonable! As I look back at it all now, I might excuse what I had become at fifteen. From then on, however, I can't excuse it, and I make no effort to do so.

I want to pass over the next ten or fifteen years quickly, but I want you to know them, because I want you to know the sort of a creature I was when I first began to know what life really meant—to know what opportunities life gives us—to know the joy of being of use and of doing for others—to know the purpose for which God put me here.

Yes, I went to prison again and again. The only reason I am not a murderer is because the bottle I used as a club was a full one, and it broke when I used it as a weapon. In prison I was punished again and again. And after an absence of about fifteen years, New York again became my hang-out.

I had reached manhood and ten years more—physically, I mean. Mentally and morally I hadn't even begun. Each succeeding year my disposition had become meaner, dirtier and blacker. My temper was a thing to dread, and my size and strength coupled with it made a combination few men dared to question.

CHAPTER X

Getting in Right

SOCIETY owed me a living, I reasoned out, and I proceeded to collect it. Nothing good got even a look-in at my soul. I hated all men who were honest, and I believed there were very few such. Every one that I knew was a grafter. My only desire was to gamble, and I was cheap and dishonest even among my own kind.

What thief and gambler is there who doesn't finally locate in New York, to stay until it gets too warm for him? And so I came. The crowds of visitors, the excitement, the chance for easy money, all these things entranced and held me. Coney Island and its adjacent race-tracks thrilled me. It goes without saying that I was a hard drinker—a drunk. For a long time I didn't use whisky, but the day came. After repeated losses, my nerves needed something to brace them, and whisky did the trick. Thousands of men start that way.

I hadn't been here in New York long before I became acquainted with a bunch of cheap ward politicians—the hangers-on to those who governed your city. Thank God, their kind is fast disappearing. Events of the past few years have either cleaned them out or compelled them to put on the soft pedal. Things began to come easier. My new friends, each a gambler and drinker, were wise, and I lost no time in getting wise, too!

With friends like my new ones, politicians, I became more daring, more reckless. It was easy to avoid trouble, for influence was bought and sold like any of the household commodities you are familiar with. Protection was an article of merchandise like coal or stocks. The price fluctuated with the conditions. Sometimes it was cheap, sometimes expensive; but it could always be had. Sometimes it was bought with cash, sometimes with cigars and whisky, and at other times with personal service.

I became a part of that side of New York. I aligned myself with the lowest and most despicable end of society, and I did it all with a full knowledge of what it meant.

CHAPTER XI

In Which I Marry

ABOUT this time I learned of a woman who was employed in the rectory of one of New York's swellest churches on a street in the twenties. This woman had a bank-roll of about two thousand dollars, the hard-earned savings of many years of toil. To me that sounded good. With two thousand dollars I could make a killing at the race-track. The more I thought about that two thousand, the more I wanted it. The more I thought about owning it, the more I thought about owning the owner of that two thousand also. I laid a wager I'd get her.

It was time I married. All my friends, the cheap politicians, were married. It would be convenient for me to have a wife now, and so I promptly set out to get one.

Did I love this woman? No, I did not. I couldn't for the life of me have told what it meant to love. And so I deceived this good, pure woman that I might make her my wife, secure her savings, and then treat her as fancy dictated, keep her or throw her over. I covered up my past. That was easy, for she believed in me. I associated myself with her church and through her I was made its janitor. I married before she even suspected that I drank. Here I was, a lying, drinking, gambling thief, the husband of as pure and innocent a woman as ever lived.

That's the thing I had become. That's what years of sin had made me—that's what sin will make of any one if given time. Not only because it's true do I want to tell it, but because, through seventeen years of the same treatment, yes, and worse treatment, that true and brave and loyal little woman stood by me and her marriage vows—for better or for worse they had been!

The two thousand was easily obtained and went as easily, just as planned. Then we were penniless. And so again I went to stealing, for I had to drink, and I had to gamble, and that required more money than the church paid me.

We were now in a little place of our own, she in the meantime having left her duties in the rectory. The women of the parish, many of them very wealthy, loved my wife, and some of them visited her in our little home. I met them both at home and at the church, a I acknowledged their love and ei many kindnesses to my wife by he ng myself to those of their belon gs which pleased my fancy.

Sometimes I came home to her gularly. Sometimes for days and v ks at a time she didn't know whether vas dead or alive. But she prayed! She prayed for me till the day she p sed away. God answers prayer! He answered hers! That's my gre est comfort now!

And then came a time when he penniless and alone, was forced t go out and earn her own living. She uld get nothing from me. And thus t gs went on. More and more of the ti e I was away, and one after another o her friends dropped their calling. She v ild not give me up, so they were forc to give us up.

When I needed money quickly, v ich happened frequently, I'd take al she had—steal her paltry earnings— ar her out of everything of value. ne after time this happened, and stil he stuck, wishing, hoping, begging, cr ng, praying that I would change.

And me? Yes, I promised. I'd promise anything for money.

That then was the sort of husba I made her.

There are men today doing the m things. I want them to know my ory—to know that no matter how far wn a fellow gets there's a sure road u —a sure road to happiness for them an for their wives!

CHAPTER XII

In Which I Begin to Slide Down he Hill from Which There Is B One Path Back

THE New York pace in the u er-world to which I belonged w a pretty stiff one. It required at nerve-force to keep it up. A man ds stimulation in order to stand it g. The life keeps one up day and n ht. I was no exception, and I needed st ulation. Like all in my class I tho ht whisky gave it to me. Before long I as either drunk or half drunk day nd night. And then my skill as a ief began little by little to disappea I bungled things that I used to get ay with easily. My nerve had gone, o. The sharp, keen edge of my wits ad become dulled by drink. The da of easy money were gone. It was h er and harder to get. And then came a ne when I was forced to go to my frie ls the politicians, and ask for a job.

There was still enough of me ft intact, so that at times I could be o se to them, and I got the job. They n de me a foreman in the Street Clea ng Department. What a fine specime of a man to be working for the city! V at a type to be put in charge of c er workmen! However, I was part a rotten political bunch, and I was t en care of, just as others before and er me were cared for.

There on the department th gs eased up a bit. There was consider le to be had in the way of graft, a I wasn't long in getting wise. To mo of it I had been tipped off in adva e. The rest I dug up and developed my lf. The biggest clean-up came from e snow.

My wife got none of my money, ot even my salary. I gambled it ll away long before I received it. e was earning what she could in a bi er fight to clothe and feed herself and y the rent.

I pulled myself together tempora y after I had been on the Street-Clea ng Department about three years. I v nt a step higher through the same liticians.

All my life, mind you, I had bro n the law—the law of every state and y I'd ever visited. Law was nothing o me. Those who were paid to upl d the law were nothing to me t grafters.

A-FISHERMAN-DREAMS
By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

I'm fishing through the bars—
Yes.. They're made of steel...
It's fun to throw the line out far, to feel
The fish a-biting like they used to, when—
What? A lifer? No; y' see, in early May Just twenty years from now, they'll free me.. Say!
Feel that tug? I almost caught one then.
It got away.

Yes, the fish used to bite like that when..
I was on the farm
Somehow it seems a million years ago!
I thought the world was good-and free from harm-
God, what's the use! There was a little mill,
The stream of it was filled with speckled trout;
Some days I thought I'd hardly last until My work was done, and I could pull them out-
Enough for supper, maybe, maybe more;
And then I'd stop and leave some at her door.

She had brown eyes, the truest sort of eyes,
All filled up with a trust that never dies..
She-loved me then.. Sometimes she called me "dear."
I meant, some day, to bring her fame and gold,
And pearls and rubies, all her hands could hold.
And as I fished, I'd plan it out, and dream,
And watch the dying sunlight on the stream.
Do all dreams fade?
She doesn't know I'm here.

I wonder if God thinks I'm awful bad?
He couldn't, for He loved the little lad
That used to dream-He loved those dreams of mine-Forgot Him? Almost. But He loves me still.
What's twenty years to Him? Why, He's divine!
He'd say, "Do better, man, I know you will!"
He was a friend, He's still a friend-of mine.
I'm fishing through the bars-
Yes, they're made of steel...
It's nice to throw the line out far, to feel—
Well, free again! It's nice to see the sun;
It's nice to be-alive--to have some fun,
To make believe that life has just begun,
To dream and plan, just like I used to, when-Say, feel that tug? I almost caught one then!

Dollars and Cents

By
R. WARREN KIMSEY

HICKS rested his elbow upon the hymn book and settled himself more comfortably in the straight-backed chair. The ch had been singing something about pr e and thanksgiving, and now the pr her of the occasion was getting ur r headway. Hicks, the bass, glanced ab t through the choir, making quick m al notes as to the attitudes of the va ous members.

here was the leading tenor, who was al choir-director, leaning back with ar folded across his breast, basking in e anticipated approval of what his h had done. True, the sister churches of he town had combined with the Fi Church, being represented both in e audience and in the choir, but the di tor—well, he knew who had made h music a success! Hicks was aw e of the feeling of boredom wi which the rest, with the ex ption of the director, draped th selves over the chairs.

was Thanksgiving morning. B Hicks had not come with the id of worship or Thanksgiving up rmost in his mind. In fact, had been cornered and asked, p t-blank, to give a reason for hi presence in the choir on this pa icular morning, he probably w ld have said, "Well, I suppose because I need the money. T y need somebody for a solo, I need the money—easy igh." That was his way— a mmodating and outspoken.

ut Hicks was impressionable. It would depend altogether on th speaker as to whether or not he became a worshiper. His si ing with the choir was purely p essional and unsympathetic. A now, because there was n ing else to do, he allowed the w ls of the visiting minister t ake form in his mind. He e ght the trend of thought in midst of a sentence, thus: "knowing full well that this h been a grand and glorious . The freight trains have s ot about over our land dis t ting a rich and bountiful h est. Prosperity and peace h come upon us from every h d. The workingman has gone f h and earned his bread by the s t of his brow, knowing that. n his return at the close of , he would find his loved ones . Let the birds break forth singing; let the mountains their hands; let all the——" icks let go—mentally. At th instant he thought of white- ged flying machines that soar h , and then crumple up and c h to the ground; he thought reat silken balloons that spring o meet the sky and then come vling and twisting, snake- li, back to the earth. No; the p cher might go on up, he d ided to remain on earth.

OW, because Hicks was impressionable, he turned about a looked toward the audience. T re, the second seat from the f t, to his right, sat an elderly couple. T man had the blue eyes, light hair— showing gray—and the full-moon face of a prosperous German farmer. leaned well against the back of the s t, clasping short, pudgy fingers ether over an ample front. Hicks once decided that the world-famous nta" must have been born in many. With shining eyes and htly nodding head the jolly brother owed and endorsed all that the acher said. By his side sat the patient e. There was nothing striking about . As Hicks looked at her he thought work—hard, toilsome, exacting work. t one glance at her face showed that too, like her well-fed husband, was ting along with the preacher, far ve this "vale of tears."

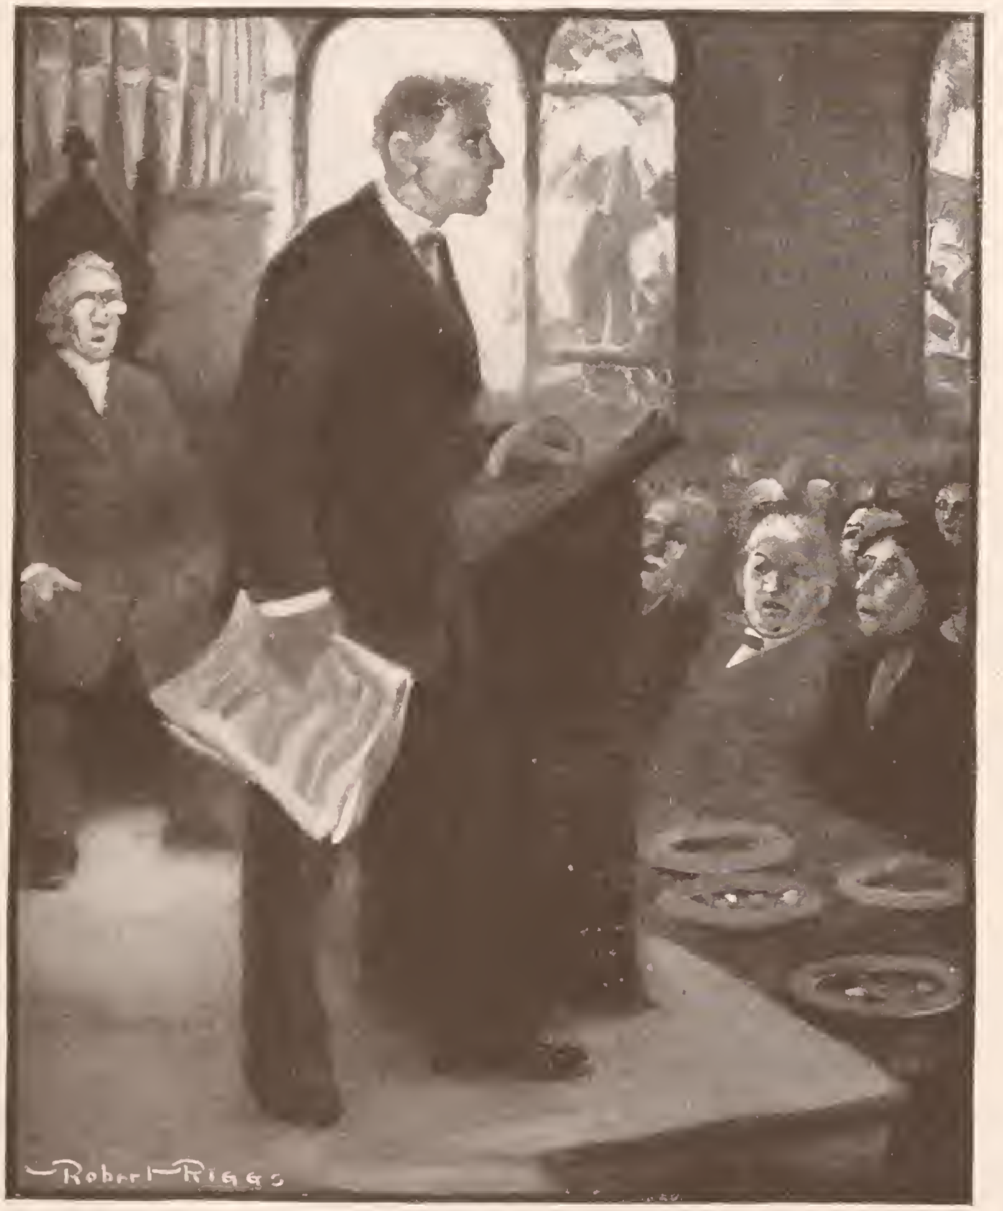
Hicks looked deeper into the audience to where a grizzled old brother slept with child-like simplicity. His elbow rested upon the end of the seat, and the side of his face cupped snugly into the palm of his hand. Something about it reminded Hicks of his grandfather's old gray cat that used to sit and doze before the open fire during the long winter evenings.

Still farther back were two young ladies, altogether new. Not new of face—new of clothing. From high-heeled shoes—one peeped out from the end of the seat—to crowning hats, they were new: silkily and wondrously attired. The sight brought to Hicks's remembrance something about flowers—lilies, of course: "Solomon in all his glory——"

Thus, as Hicks's gaze shifted aimlessly about over the crowd, he saw indications of prosperity on every hand. Surely here were a thankful people—they had sufficient reasons for being thankful. He began a mental estimate. Yes—easy enough: he could account for thousands upon thousands of dollars in the audience; and——

"Out of our abundance we should give freely and gladly to those who are less fortunate—those in real need."

Hicks caught at the words. Evidently the good brother had come back to earth—this was "common ground." He was talking about giving? Hicks saw a troubled expression pass over the face of the ample German. And then, acting upon a suggestion, he looked down to where the collection plates rested upon a table in front of the pulpit.



"Just a moment, please," he said. "I have something to say"

COULD it be possible? The light was rather dim—perhaps he had not seen clearly. No—it was true: Pennies! Yellow, greenish, dirty, sickening pennies. Dozens of them leered at him from the open plates. This was the Thanksgiving offering from that audience. There were a few scattered pieces of silver swamped among the wretched coppers. At that instant in his heart he despised coppers. The childhood glory of pennies that equaled striped sticks of candy faded forever from his mind.

Suddenly he thought of his own quarter—it had been consistent with his means—as lying in that loathsome mess. He longed to go down and pick it out, if possible: it would look better out by itself than to be surrounded by those insulting coppers.

Then something that he had overlooked thrust itself upon his attention. A lone half-dollar was leaning against the side of one of the plates. It was separated, by at least two inches, from the beggarly pennies. Hicks admired the half-dollar. In fact, it seemed to be trying to climb out of the plate and get off by itself. He told himself that he would not be greatly surprised to see it leap out and go rolling off to the remotest part of the table. He thought of it as being ashamed of itself for having to occupy such a position in a Thanksgiving offering. As near as he could tell, it was the only half-dollar in the plate—there were no larger pieces.

The speaker reached the close of the sermon. The great organ trembled and mellowed into an opening chord as Hicks listened. It was the solo. His solo!

He arose and walked mechanically out upon the platform, automatically getting away from under the big instrument. Then he caught sight of the collection plates. The lone half-dollar seemed to be pleading for deliverance. As he looked at the pennies his song stood forth as cheap—a mere mockery. There came to him no anticipation of pleasure in its rendition. But the song must start—soon. He cast about for the opening sentence. "Let me be kind in word and deed—" Had anybody been kind in deed that morning? The pennies still claimed his attention. They appeared to have taken on a personality; they smirked mockingly. Could he sing over them?

THE organ paused and lingered upon the keynote, waiting for the voice. But no voice responded. A wave of rebellion swept over Hicks; he opened his mouth, but not to sing.

"Just a moment, please," he said, turning toward the organist. "I have something to say." A rustle went through the audience.

"I want to ask what this offering is for," continued Hicks, pointing to the plates and addressing no one in particular.

A depressing silence followed. Some man in the audience cleared his throat, and it was startling, like a buzz saw cutting through a knot. One of the ministers arose.

"Why, I—I supposed everybody knew the purpose of the Thanksgiving offering," he said, nervously. "It goes to help the poor and needy." After uttering these words he looked at Hicks, then toward the audience, and, parting the tails of his coat carefully, sat down. Preachers and audience were bewildered. Hicks stood with one hand resting lightly on the pulpit. His outward appearance was calm, but inwardly he was revolting.

"To help the poor and needy?" echoed Hicks. Then something long dormant in his nature surged forward.

"Look at those collection plates!" he said excitedly, pointing to the plates and advancing nearer the edge of the platform. "To help the poor—pennies where there should be dollars! Miserable pennies to help the poor. How much will they help?"

Consternation stood out on every face.

"I'll tell you this," said Hicks—conviction was back of the tone—"I won't sing over such an offering.

"You collectors pass these plates again and get a real offering and I will sing." Then leaning forward Hicks dropped a one-dollar bill into the nearest plate. He noted with keen satisfaction how many coppers it covered.

Just when the silence that followed was becoming oppressive, the notes of a familiar offertory stole out from the organ. There was a quieting, soothing influence about the music. The collection plates were passed quietly through the pews.

During this time, Hicks stood with his eyes directed toward the floor. As the plates came back the organ swung into the introduction of the solo—his solo. Hicks wondered if he would remember the opening sentence. Then he looked down at the offering.

There were no pennies to be seen. Paper and silver covered them. The organ slipped into the keynote, but waited not this time. The opening sentence came—rushing to be sung, a real Thanksgiving offertory.

Twenty-five Million Starving

By
GEORGE T. WEBB, D.D.

NOT in the history of the human race has there been a condition of such dire need and extreme suffering as is present in the world today. War was never so fearful, cruelty was never so vicious, as has been the case in the present European struggle. Countries have been devastated and the resources for human sustenance have been confiscated to such a degree that the story of suffering in these countries is entirely beyond the power of the human mind to comprehend.

America was never more prosperous. Her fields, her gardens, and her orchards were never more fruitful. Her mines and her mills were never more productive Her commerce was never more abundant. The high prices she is receiving for her wares are far beyond and above anything that has ever been known before.

The suffering and poverty of Europe make a strong, and, in some cases, silent, appeal to the affluence and abundance enjoyed by the American people.

It is difficult, if indeed it is at all possible, to discover any good in the midst of the strife and starvation in Europe. If one ray of good is discoverable, it is in the fact that the spirit of sacrifice to a great cause and high ideals has been developed in a wonderful way. Men march out to give their lives for the cause that to them is worth while. The women and children face the hardships, the hunger and the multiplied cruelties of the situation with a heroism made noble by the spiritual vision that glories in the sacrifice they are making for the sake of the cause they hope to attain.

There is danger that, in this moment of the world's crisis, America may be the greatest loser among the nations of the world. America suffers no hunger, faces no menace, endures no cruelty; but while our sister nations are developing a spiritual idealism through service and sacrifice, it is possible that our American people, and especially the American Christian, may miss the spiritual blessings through the subtlety of selfish indulgence.

We need to know the world's need; and then, in the quiet of personal judgment and under the guidance of an enlightened conscience, decide what we will do, what we will sacrifice, and how we will serve for the relief of our brothers and sisters who are suffering and starving while we are surfeited.

Look at this list of needs:

BELGIUM

3,000,000 destitute people in Belgium are kept living by the relief furnished through the Commission for Relief in Belgium. This number is about one-half of the inhabitants of the kingdom, and they are drawing daily one meal, which consists of three thick slices of bread and a pint of soup. $5,000,000 are needed at once.

NORTHERN FRANCE

2,112,000 people, a large proportion of them women and children, are going barefoot. Women and children are suffering from lack of clothing and from improper nourishment. $5,000,000 are necessary for immediate relief.

SERBIA

5,000,000 people are deprived of their living and of any chance to make it. $5,000,000 would only provide one dollar for each sufferer. Five thousand children, made orphans in the last two years, cry out from Serbia for some kind of relief.

POLAND

11,000,000 homeless wanderers, mostly women and children, are suffering from exposure, hunger and disease.

EAST PRUSSIA

This country, like Poland, has been overrun by the contesting armies, and the inhabitants are suffering intensely. It is impossible to get definite word from this section of the number of sufferers or the condition of their needs. It must be dreadful to contemplate. The American Relief Committee for Widows and Orphans in Germany seeks relief for 500,000 widows and twice as many orphans. This is probably a very low estimate of the real number.

Could anything be sadder than the expression on the face of this motherless little girl who sees in her companion not a big hero father back from the war to make everything in the dreary home as it was before, but a helpless charge to be cared for, and led about the streets possibly to beg? What a blasting change is this for childhood to confront! . . . What will you do to lighten such burdens?

ARMENIA

What is left of the Armenian people presents a dreadful spectacle of want and suffering.

300,000 refugees in Turkey.
500,000 refugees in Damascus, Zor and Aleppo are destitute. There are 200,000 survivors in the Caucasus and Persian Armenia.
50,000 of them are girls under fifteen;
60,000 of them, boys under fifteen.
1,175,000 people in all who have no means to help themselves.

ALBANIA

This land presents a spectacle of a nation dying of hunger. The armies have swept over their country, taking all that they could take, leaving the women and children behind to starve. The Albanians are more numerous than the Armenians, but they have been sadly neglected in the midst of their dire need. Corn is now sold at fifty dollars a bushel; flour, eighty dollars a sack; and macaroni, at five dollars a pound. The population of the nation will be wiped out by famine and pestilence, unless help is forthcoming speedily.

This spectacle of abject destitution gives us—

3,000,000 suffering people in Belgium,
2,112,000 " " " Northern France,
5,000,000 " " " Serbia,
11,000,000 " " " Poland,
1,500,000 " " " East Prussia,
1,175,000 " " " the Armenian Di er.
1,500,000 " " " Albania.

25,287,000 suffering people in extreme destitutio nd helplessness.

CAN we comprehend the meani of these figures, or are we only daze by the vague, indefinite magnitude? Th k a minute. If these destitute, helpless bro ers and sisters of ours should each occup our thought for thirty seconds, and we sl uld give our time without interruptio for either eating or sleeping, using every se nd of the twenty-four hours of each da it would be more than twenty years b ore we had given the brief thirty secon of thought to the last child.

Again, this vast number is equal t he combined population of the cities of ew York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston St Louis, Baltimore, Cleveland, Pittsburg San Francisco, Detroit, Buffalo, Washin on Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, ew Orleans, Kansas City, Seattle, St. ul and the whole population of the Dom ion of Canada on top of it.

Again, if these destitute, helpless uf-ferers should form in a procession m ch-ing sixteen abreast, and stretching om curb to curb of our broad streets, each an four feet behind the one in front of m the front line of that vast procession v ld be in San Francisco before the last o he procession had passed Philadelphia!

Again, if this vast number of p ple should form in a procession, four ab st; each line four feet behind the one in on of it, and march with rapid strides a the rate of four miles per hour, and kee on marching for twenty-four hours of ery day, seven days of every week, it v ld be four months and a half before the ro-cession would pass a given point. A all of these people are actually suffering nd unable to provide for themselves.

In view of this appalling picture of uf-fering and want, what will America o Out of our affluence we ought to on-tribute not less than one million dollars a day, v ch would be more than twenty-five times as mu as we have given.

The situation is a challenge to the spirit of brothe ood in American life. Can we meet it? If America an ers this challenge with real sacrifice, in the spirit o he Christ, she will prove her worth and save her life. ow appalling is the other fact that if she seeks to ve herself in self indulgence, then America will los ner soul!

The spiritual crisis is in America today more an it is in the bloodsoaked fields of Europe.

Travel Upon Alaska's Mighty Rive

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I AM on the Lower Yukon, on my way down to Bering Sea. For the past two months I have been traveling upon this mighty stream and its tributaries. I first saw it on the summit of the divide, within fifteen miles of the Pacific, on the mountains high above Skagway. As I stood there I could see the parting of the continental rainfall, and was able to throw chips into two streams, one flowing down to the Pacific Ocean and the other by way of the Yukon to far-off Bering Sea.

The first chip had to travel only about as far as from Washington to Mount Vernon on its way to salt water. The other had to go farther than the distance between Boston and the Great Salt Lake. The most of my travels since then have been in the tracks of the second chip.

I followed it down the mountains and through Lake Bennett to the town of White Horse, in Canada. At White Horse I got a steamer that traveled the path of the chip through the Lewes River into the Yukon and past the mouth of the Klondike to the city of Dawson. From Dawson I steamed to the international boundary, and thence wound my way through some of the most magnificent scenery of Alaska, by Eagle City and Circle City, where I entered the great Yukon Flats. These are an inland sea 200 miles long and in places 20 miles wide. They flow across the Arctic Circle, and it was at that point, Fort Yukon, that I passed the mouth of the Porcupine River, which rises not far from the Peel, a branch of the Mackenzie which pours into the Arctic. From Fort Yukon I steamed on to Fort Gibbon, at the mouth of the Tanana, where the Lower Yukon begins.

After leaving the Flats the Yukon twists about like a great liquid corkscrew until it comes to Fort Hamlin. Here it narrows and enters the Ramparts, a valley with fortlike walls rising up on both sides. Here the course is reduced from a width of several miles to eight or nine hundred feet, and the valley in places is only half a mile wide. Steep hills, covered with trees and moss, rise straight up from the river, and in some places they are more than a thousand feet high. The current is swift, and in the heart of the valley the water flows at the rate of seven miles an hour. This is near the Island of Rocks, where it is planned to make a bridge for the new railway, if it should ever be extended on to the Seward peninsu come to the perpetual ice. It is roots have no soil on them and they n to be bedded in moisture.

It was during this walk that I had my first experience with the Alaska mosquitoes. The animals were not fierce, and their bites not as severe as those of the New Jersey species. I had neither gloves nor head-net, and suffered no great discomfort. This, I am told, is very unusual. In ordinary years the mosquitoes are almost unbearable. They come in May and June, shortly after the breaking of the ice. At that time every one who goes through the country must wear a head-net and have his hands protected with gloves. Not a bit of skin is allowed to show. It is best to wear boots, for the mosquitoes bore their way through the eyelet holes in one's shoes, and their bites raise great buttons of flesh on each side of the tongue. I have heard of men being killed by the mosquitoes, and they say the horses and other animals almost go crazy if they are left out in the woods.

Leaving Kaltag, the Yukon flows almost straight south for a distance of 150 miles or more to the Holy Cross Mission, near which the Innoko River flows in. The Innoko gives access to the rich gold-mining region known as the Iditarod. The camp is reached by sailing up the Innoko, to Dykeman, which is the head of navigation of the Iditarod River, a branch of the Innoko. The distance is about 350 miles, and from there to the camp is 75 miles farther. The Iditarod gold region was discovered in 1909, and it had yielded $6,000,000 worth of gold within the next two years. A great deal of gold has been taken out of the Iditarod. Many of the claims have been bonded or bought by the Guggenheims.

Between Kaltag and the Holy Cross Mission is Anvik, an Indian settlement with a Russian church, and still farther down the river is Andreafski, which was established by the Russians in 1853. Andreafski is now a little trading station on the banks of the Yukon. It has a great oil tank, and the steamers stop there to take fuel. The town is populated almost altogether by Eskimos.

IT is at Andreafski that the delta of the Yukon is said to begin. As you go on from Andreafski the Yukon widens. It is soon three miles from one bank to the other. Then it branches out into wide channels, each of which is a mouth, and where it flows into the sea these mouths have become a great fan 100 miles wide, the various streams forming the ribs. In flood time the whole country is under water. Islands grow up in a night and new sand bars are to be seen at every voyage. In places the stream is so wide that you can see little else but a vast expanse of yellow water rimmed by the sapphire sky. When you get close to the shore you seem to be riding by one mighty pasture.

The government has done little to protect the navigation of the Yukon. The only lights on this mighty stream, with its winding course, its scores of tributaries and its thousands of shifting sand bars and islands, are where the river flows into the ocean. The system all told has four thousand miles or more of navigable and navigated waters, and there is not a lighthouse, a buoy, nor a mark of any kind to aid the shipping. There are only a few buoys and a light at the Apoon mouth of the river; and the light is an eight-day lantern hung on a pole. Some of the captains are accustomed to put up their own marks to aid them in subsequent voyages. As we passed through the delta the captain of our steamer showed me a barrel lying in the middle of a sand bar. The sand bar was under water during the last trip, and the captain had anchored the barrel there to locate it. Since then the bar has risen above the water and become a large island with the barrel in its middle. The captains all keep records of each trip, noting the changes and handing their sketches over to the captains following them.

The Yukon River is navigated from the 15th of June until the 15th of October every year. It is the highway to the interior of Alaska, and the river should be thoroughly platted and marked. There should be a government lighthouse boat moving up and down it, and the marks and lights should be changed with the course of the river, just as is done on the Mississippi.

Revelation 1

The Meanings of the Apocalypse

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE Book of Revelation is the only one of its kind in the New Testament, and so different from the simple narrative of the Gospels and Acts, and the practical letters of advice and teaching from Paul, James and John, that many Bible students have felt embarrassed and ignorant in dealing with it. Yet Revelation is not unique—one can find similar passages in Daniel and also in the Shorter Prophets, as the first chapter of Zephaniah. But still greater light has come to our aid in the discovery and study of a whole range of similar books—the Book of Enoch, the Sybilline Oracles, the Book of Jubilees, and the Apocalypse of Baruch, for example. Many of these books were Jewish, and still others were a Christian working-over of Jewish thought and symbolism. All have one dominating purpose—to assure the faithful, whether in Jewish or Christian churches, of the final triumph of God and his righteousness. All were rich in Oriental splendor of words and marvelous imagery of thought, and quite characteristic of the century before and that after the advent of Christ.

Our Apocalypse of John is the greatest and best of these works, the genuinely Christocentric one, the only one in which the supremacy of the Spirit never wavers. Hence, under the guidance of God, it was selected and enshrined in our New Testament and became its fitting capstone and climax. We ought then to know it better.

The Essential Message

WRITTEN in a time of persecution and hideous triumph of evil in this world, its central teaching is the certainty of the consummation of God's plan and the assurance of reward for those who are faithful in great tribulation. It is a message of consolation, of lovely anticipation, of kindling hope that brings the courage to endure. Yet it recognizes to the full the power of evil and the forces of sin, and therefore the vision is one of terrific combat and world-shaking events. There is no more wonderful piece of writing on earth for dignity and power. The chants of the symbolic creatures, the angels and the saints are marvelous. (See the Revised Version, where these are printed distinctively, and read aloud each chant with the introductory sentence.) The last of these has been called the sublimest seven words ever penned: "Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

This is the essence of the Revelation. Far above earth's murky battle Christ in Glory keeps watch above his own. There is a mightier factor in destiny than the earthly minded know. There is a Hand on the helm of the universe whose grasp is sure. How inexpressibly strengthening it is to realize and believe absolutely that above our power is his irresistible power! We may falter or fall in the conflict, but the Commander-in-Chief is infinitely sufficient to bring final victory for the cause and for all who suffered for it.

Symbol and Interpretation

THIS message is phrased in terms so highly imaginative, so purely symbolic, that its interpretations have been numerous and varied, many of them unreasonable and fanciful as to details. And yet in the light of the holy purposes and the righteous will of our God, we can find great meanings upon which all thinkers agree. The first of these is that its immediate and primary reference to the powers of evil refers to the Roman Empire, which had become in the writer's day the agent of Satan for the attempted obliteration of Christianity. Then, too, its predictions of tumult and of woes and disaster to this power refer, primarily, to Rome as well—"things which must shortly come to pass." The malignant civil power is described as a beast and in the control of a still de beast of military ascendancy and tory nationalism.

Yet beyond this immediate refe disguised in the allegory and number of the name," we recogniz all Christians everywhere a pict tion of universal evil, of the bea humanity, of that mysterious ten to work abomination and make Consequently it has been very na and on the whole correct, for Chr people, in various crises, to see a ment of the prophecy of this Wherever a little flock of sincere Christians have been persecuted, by paganism or ecclesiasticism, have found solace and assurance When the corruptions of the R papal system seemed likely to su the leaders and the seers of the P tant Reformation, they saw in that church the Babylon of the Apoca So, in Napoleon's time, some identified that ruthless grasper of with the Beast. In our own day, civilized Europe has fallen int clutches of militarism, "exercisi the authority of the first beast sight," we naturally think of the tinuous meaning of these things.

So the message tells anew to u Christ is still "able to open the b that his Gospel will still solve the lems of human destiny, that the doms of this world shall becom kingdoms of our Lord and of his C

The Trinity in Revelation

TO my mind, this book throws a on the vexed, debatable do of the Trinity. As a matter of fac first chapter abounds in triniti thought. "The revelation of Christ, which God gave him to his servants"—a trinity of st suggestiveness. A Bible Stud trinity: "Blessed is he that re and they that hear, and they that the word and the commandmen trinity within a trinity: "From hi was, and is, and is to come; and fro Seven Spirits that are before his th and from Jesus Christ the Fa Witness." his church—represented by the golden candlesticks. It is not at the church that John gazes, but at the Lord of the church. Transfigured, majestic, glorious, but still the same Jesus! His human side is emphasized. It is the Man of Galilee, the friend of sinners, the companion of the Twelve—yet clothed with the authority of God the Father. The Lord of Glory, the Judge of the nations, is this same Jesus whom we knew. He will not change his nature, his Gospel, or his plan for the redemption of the world.

Note, too, the symbolisms. It is not a photograph, but an allegory; a parable in description. Hair white as snow—symbolic of holiness, of purity, of candor. Eyes flashing, piercing beneath all sham and seeming, as in the days of the Pharisees. Feet, molten brass, to stamp out evil forever. Voice, manifold, world-resounding, "as the voice of many waters." Tongue, like a sword, decisive, rebuking, convicting, striking to the roots of error. Face like the splendid sun above the desert. This picture, so metaphorical, should guide and guard our interpretation of the other visions.

How mistaken, for example, was the citation of the sword of Revelation as a justification of militarism! Christ's sword is in his mouth! It is the word of truth, the source of power in moral realities, the conviction that right shall finally prevail. Christ will not change his tactics and establish his kingdom by brute force. His sword is the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

Fear Not!

JOHN was overcome by the meaning of the revelation. Before that holiness, those searching eyes, that voice of authority, he fell as one dead. Like Isaiah of old, the first reflex from a vision of the Deity was sin-consciousness and a sense of doom. But Christ still has that word so often on his lips in Galilee—"Fear not, it is I." The same loving Friend, the same mighty Saviour, the same compelling Master. He truly died but is alive forevermore. A reassurance to the persecuted and the martyred. Jesus had experienced it all, he understood, and he had conquered. The keys of death and hell are in his keeping; he can unlock their gates, and deliver his saints. The secrets are plain to him, the answers to earth's dark doubts are known. Eternal compassion abides in him, and the victory that overcomes the world.

"Write the things." The divine compulsion is upon the exile of Patmos, and he gives to the world those dreams, those anticipations of glory, those wondrous messages of faith that Christ had revealed in his heart. Rightly understood, his conception of heaven is solace, guide and battle-cry to loyal followers of the Christ.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Observe Thanksgiving

THE Sunday school plans for observance of Thanksgiving Day or the Sunday nearest that day should include the idea of home-coming as well as of patriotism.

A sunrise prayer meeting may properly inaugurate the day, including, of course, the recitation of thanks verses. The decorations will consist of fruits, groceries and vegetables for the platform. Red apples, pumpkins, cornstalks, and trimmed baskets will add greatly to the platform effect.

The program will include the reading of the President's Thanksgiving proclamation by a scholar, the singing of such hymns as "Count Your Blessings," brief papers or addresses by teachers and scholars on the subject of the first Thanksgiving, when red men and white men joined in praise; the Feast of Tabernacles; old-time Thanksgiving customs; present-day causes of Thanksgiving; recitation of such Psalms as the 104th or 147th; recitation of "thanks" verses by scholars or classes or departments; the telling of the story of Ruth; a national song, and the Doxology.

It will be a good plan to distribute note sheets the Sunday preceding Thanksgiving. On these the scholars will write their own reasons for Thanksgiving. The best of these can be read the next Sunday.

As the great Home-Coming Day, the invitations to the Thanksgiving service mailed to each scholar should carry out the thought of the day. The three invitations, copies of which are given below, were recently used by the Bushwick Avenue M. E. Sunday School of Brooklyn, and could easily be used as Thanksgiving letters:

For the Intermediates and Seniors.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—When I've been traveling around this world, do you know the spot that's greenest to me? It's in Brooklyn, and I spell it with four letters. Be it ever so humble, there's no place quite like it.

And what is it that makes home? I suppose it's the folks, our books, music, pictures of friends, memories attached to particular spots in the home, and above all, real love—the fact that folks there love us whether we deserve it or not.

This letter is a love message to you from "Daddy" Brown, inviting you to come to Bushwick's great Home-Coming Day, Sunday, October 22, at 2:30. I want you and every member of our Bushwick family to make it one of our brightest Rally Days, because of the home songs, the home spirit, the home welcome.

The latch-string will be on the outside. Pull it sure, for it won't be a real home-coming without you.

As ever, your friend.

For the Junior Department Scholars.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—I thought you would like a letter from Daddy Brown, so here goes.

October is the month for a lot of good things. One of these is our Bushwick Sunday School Home-Coming Day, on Sunday, October 22. And when you think of home you think of the fire, and some one who loves you, and books and music and whistling boys and laughing girls, and lots of good things.

Well, I want you and all my big Bushwick family to come home October 22 at 2:30, for a sort of house-warming at the Sunday school home. There will be a real homey scene on the Junior platform, and home pictures, and some boys whistling a good home song.

So come and be sure to invite all the folks for me and find a new member for our Bushwick family.

Your Sunday school daddy.

For the Teachers.

DEAR FRIEND:—Did you know that Sunday, October 22, at 2:30, is Bushwick's great Home-Coming Day?

In the morning our officers and teachers will gather at 10:20 in the Intermediate room to march into the church as a body to reserved seats for Pastor Bishop's first annual sermon to our Sunday school workers. So be there sure.

We are later than usual in our Home Rally Day. And that is why I want you to work extra hard for the attendance of every member of your class after the long school closing, so that we can go right ahead for a great Home-Coming year.

How can we make it such a year? I think by putting into it the home spirit, the home love, by understanding and talking the home language, by letting the home welcome to your scholars shine through your eyes and grip in your handshake. It will be great if you can get more into your scholars' home life this year and have them touch your heart and home life a bit closer.

And will we not try hard to give them a little closer view of our Big Brother, and give them surer directions so that none of them will miss finding Home? And if any have not started, or have stumbled on the way, will you not search them out and direct them to the church home?

How good it will be at the final Home-Coming if you can introduce them all to the King of the Homeland!

Pray for every member of the Bushwick family.

As ever your friend.

A Thanksgiving social for young people may have as its entrance requirement a Scripture verse with "Thanks" in it, and some vegetable offering. The decorations should be the Colonial colors. The program will consist of references to the ancient Feast of Harvest, songs, recitations, poems, and incidents relating to the Pilgrim Fathers and the early colonists. The games will turn on the thought of Thanksgiving, and the refreshments may be served by maids dressed in Priscilla style and the boys as John Aldens. Pumpkin lanterns will light the tables.

"HOW NEAR IS THE FIRE?"
"HOW'S THE WIND?"

—are the questions which need not bother the owner of this house. Let firebrands fall or sparks fly, the beautiful roof cannot take fire because it is covered with

Real Help for Tired Feet

A busy day and on your feet most of the time—a long, tiresome trip or a hike in the country—new shoes to break in—all these mean tired feet. Soothe and rest them by applying a few drops of Absorbine, Jr.

Or, if you are very tired and your feet burn, ache, or swell, soak them in a solution of Absorbine, Jr., and water. Relief will be prompt and lasting.

Absorbine.Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT

is a different kind of liniment—it is antiseptic and germicidal. It will do what any other good liniment will do—and a lot more. Absorbine, Jr., is made of herbs and is positively harmless to human tissues. It can not only be used and prescribed with confidence and safety but with the assurance that it will kill germs and promote rapid healing.

You will like the "feel" of this clean, fragrant and antiseptic liniment. It penetrates quickly, leaves no greasy residue, and is intensely refreshing. Only a few drops needed to do the work as Absorbine, Jr., is highly concentrated.

You can find dozens of uses for Absorbine, Jr., as a dependable first aid remedy and regular toilet adjunct: To reduce inflammatory conditions—sprains, wrenches, painful swollen veins. To allay pain anywhere. To spray the throat if sore or infected. To heal cuts, bruises, lacerations and sores.

Absorbine, Jr., Has Strong Endorsements

Many letters in praise of Absorbine, Jr., have been received from physicians and dentists who use and prescribe it.

Several chemical and biological laboratories have given this antiseptic liniment severe tests, and their reports invariably support my claims for Absorbine, Jr., as a destroyer of germs.

Then, of course, I have hundreds of testimonials from individuals who have been materially benefited by Absorbine Jr., in one way or another.

Just People

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, J

A LITTLE letter came to me from a Home in the Southwest. It said: "You can write to help us all by saying that there are no old people as a separate class—something set aside, away from life's busy affairs—by saying that we are all just people, a part of the busy throbbing life around us, interested in the same things that those who have not lived so long are interested in. I may be old, but I cannot feel it. I do not know what feeling old is. I just want to be that noble thing—a person."

"I do not know what feeling old is!" That's what the little lady in the Home wrote to me. And she started her letter this way: "I am celebrating my sixty-fourth birthday by writing to you."

A GREAT many of my pen-and-ink friends are past sixty. A number of them are past three-score-and-ten. Many of them are grandmothers: a few of them are great-grandmothers. Among these dear "older girls" there is a little lady from the prairies of the Far West who plants flower gardens in the desert place that is her door-yard; there's another one who, as a child, crossed the vast continent in a canvas prairie schooner. There's a small white-haired woman who has always wanted to be a poet, and at seventy-two still holds the dream in her heart. She was too busy taking care of her little children—"there was always a baby to hold," she wrote me—for much poetry-writing. There's the woman who has gone blind and is singing in the dark! Oh, yes; many of my pen-and-ink friends are past sixty—away past sixty. And there's something young—be it a hope, or a plan, or a dream, or a prayer, in the souls of each.

There is a woman who lives in our town—stately, white-haired, serene. She was sixty-nine her last birthday. Her oldest grandson is eighteen—her oldest daughter is forty. She is the mother of a large family, all happily married now, and bringing up other families of their own. Sons-in-law and daughters-in-law adore her. There's never a gown planned that she isn't consulted about, never a dinner given that she doesn't help with the menu, never a baby born that she isn't the first to hold it. She's never considered too old to go out on a sleigh ride, or to attend a party, or to help at a shopping expedition—despite the stateliness of her carriage and the whiteness of her hair.

"My mother," says the oldest daughter, "seems more like a sister than a mother. Old? No, she's not old!"

"Why," I ventured, "she told me herself that she was past sixty-nine!"

"Sixty-nine!" snorted the oldest daughter's husband. "What's sixty-nine? Why, she's young at heart."

"My grandmother," says the oldest grandchild, "is better fun to take out than any of the girls. She's a good sport!"

"My g'anny," lisps the baby, "is awful nice. She tells me 'tories!"

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY was quite a bit over sixty when he died. Although his age was not generally known, his frequent photographs show that he was not young in years, any one who has ever read his inti little child sketches, his delicious humorous, half-pathetic verses, agree with me that he was young, in his heart.

My own grandmother died at th of seventy-four, and she was y when she died. She took an a interest in all current events, in and laughter and good books. I stay with her, afternoons, after s rather than go out with comrade own age, because she was more esting than they were—far better pany. Her hair was silver, and years counted up to a large total—was all. For her heart was as you the springtime.

I've seen people who were o twenty—gloomily, sullenly old, th their cheeks were firm and their untouched with gray. So have seen such people. And I've women of eighty who walked halt and wore dim spectacles who wer wonderfully, triumphantly young

I KNOW a little lady, slim, ben unlined by the years, who sit sorbedly through all of the fa openings of the great shops and wa breathlessly as the models in marvelous gowns file past her She particularly loves the tulle bespangled evening frocks that young girls wear, and she tells us ingly of the "wonderful color, my and the way it was made!" couldn't possibly wear the gowns she admires so; she couldn't afford if they were suitable; but she them just the same.

"It's time." I once heard a nei woman say, rather sniffingly, "tha got over such—vanity. She's enough to stop thinking about clo

The neighbor didn't stop to r out that it was the love of clothe kept a spark of youth in the he the little old lady—a divine spa youth that kept her from being less, and tired, and wan.

PONCE DE LEON sailed ov seas, many centuries ago, t cover the fountain of youth so th might live forever, a young man prime of life and hope. He never the fountain; but, in his searc found a new land. And so he has really died. For his name will e the name of a man who wen searching for something worth Perhaps, although he didn't kn then, Ponce de Leon found the fou after all.

"WRITE to help us all by s that there are no old peo a separate class," requested my and-ink friend—"by saying that just people!"

Well, I've written what she me to. And you, friends of mine are past sixty, and seventy, and pe even eighty, if folk try to put you shelf—if they try to label you handle with care"—assert yourse seek a fountain of youth in some est that will keep your heart sc young that your years don't mat

A Pointed Question

IT is said that a celebrated minister prepared and preached a course of sermons against infidelity for the purpose specially of convincing and bringing over to Christianity an intelligent infidel neighbor who was a regular attendant at his church. Just after the close of the said series of sermons, the infidel professed to be awakened, and the preacher was anxious to know which of his sermons brought about the change. The new convert said, "The instrument God was pleased to use for my awakening and conversion was not the preaching of those sermons against infidelity, but the simple remark of a poor old colored woman. In going down the steps of the church one night, seeing that the poor old woman was lame. I gave her my hand, and assisted her. She looked up at me with a peculiar expression of grateful pleasure, s 'Thank you, sir. Do you love my blessed Saviour?' I was dun could not answer that question said, 'Jesus, my blessed Saviour, so much earnest confidence that ashamed to confess that I did no him. I could not dismiss this s from my mind; and the more I th of it, the clearer my convictions b that the old colored sister had a a blessed Saviour; and I thoug how kind a Saviour he must be part such joy and comfort to s poor, neglected creature. I beg regret my base ingratitude in de and rejecting such a Saviour. I simple remark of the old colored w there was clearness of faith, a j confidence that shook the foundat my refuge of lies."

What Missions Do for Childhood

ISRAEL was constantly suffering from contact with heathenism, and one of those terrible heathen customs was the sacrifice upon the altar of fire of living children. Christ said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." Wherever faith in Christ has been preached, childhood has been emancipated. In Latin America, in China, in India, Christian schools are teaching to children the story of the Saviour who loved them well enough to die for them, and these children are growing up to go forth as preachers and teachers of the Gospel. In heathendom an orphan child is an outcast, and the care and training of orphans has been a very important element in missionary work. In many cases the first converts have been orphans whom the missionaries had befriended and trained. This is well illustrated in the Chinese Orphan work of the Christian Herald. It is emancipating childhood, saving it not alone from sin, but from cruelty, hunger, even from death, and training these children to be the heralds of a better day to the land that gave them birth, but that was willing that they should die. In our own land it is the spirit of Christ that is compelling reform after reform in the laws governing childhood, evidenced particularly this year, when the force of Christian public opinion overbore greed of gain and pushed through Congress the National Child Labor Law. Our compulsory education laws, our free public schools themselves, our laws limiting the right to employ child labor, our public playgrounds, our fresh air funds, our orphanages, and our whole national attitude toward children, are largely the product of Christian teaching and of the influence upon our social consciousness of the love of Christ. These same advances in social justice must attend Christian missions in every land.

The Consecration of Business Life

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic (Consecration Meeting). Rev. 3 : 14–22

THE church at Laodicea was neither cold nor hot. It was surfeited with much goods, it felt the need of nothing, and knew not that it was poor and wretched and blind and naked in spiritual things. The Spirit was moved to spue them out of his mouth, but if they should become zealous and should repent, he was ready to stand at the door of their hearts and knock; ready, if they heard his voice, to come in and sup with them; and the promise was "to him that overcometh." Most of us would not have to go far to find a church which might be the present-day prototype of this church of the Laodiceans; but we might after all be mistaken, and might but judge ourselves when we pointed out the lukewarm church. After all, a lukewarm church is usually made up of half-chilled Christians. Our business life suffers from the same lack of real Christian vigor, of spiritual temperature. Business is not utterly sordid; it shows now and again traces of a spirit above the lust for gain. But many a thing is tolerated, often under some disquietude of conscience, because it is "good business"; and many a man refuses to link his life up definitely with Christ's church because he feels that it is impossible both to serve Christ and to succeed in business. Such a man accepts the truth of Christ and lives the denial of his truth. And business is full of that spirit; not wholly bad yet not very good; spiritually lukewarm. Business needs a great infusion of Christian love and Christian courage. Success is not bound to the chariot wheels of dishonesty or of compromise. God has wonderfully blessed thousands who have endeavored to serve him fully, whose business life has been blameless of wicked intent. Let us completely consecrate our lives to him, and then let us carry that consecration into every byway and farthest backwater of our business life.

A Genco must make good or we will.

We are proud of the Genco and you will be, too. If you aren't, we don't want you to keep it; we'd rather give you your money back. We have such faith in the Genco that we simply say to you: Use this razor 30 days or any length of time you think necessary to test it, and if you don't find it the best razor you ever shaved with, send it back and we will return your money. The Genco must make good or we will.

Order on the coupon below

Pin your bill, money order or check to the coupon below and mail it to us today. If your beard and skin are normal, order the $2 Genco. If you have a very tender skin or a very wiry beard, send $3 for the extra-full concave Genco. Remember, whichever one you send for—if it isn't right, you can't lose; we'll make good. I'll never buy loose coffee again this has lost all its strength.

This Arbuckle's package keeps in all the strength. Arbuckle's is always fresh, always good and strong.

How to buy coffee

You can always have the flavor and strength you want

Does the coffee you buy vary—is it good one time and bad the next?

Has it lost its aroma? Are you often disappointed in its strength?

It isn't the grocer's fault. With loose coffee, bulk coffee, he can't be sure that it is the same kind he got before. You always run the risk of getting a different coffee every time you buy. And even if the coffee itself were the same, it can't be kept "loose" without losing its strength and flavor!

Protected in sealed packages

You can do away with every coffee disappointment by ordering the coffee which over one million other families drink!

Arbuckles' Coffee is such a good coffee that way back in the sixties, when all other coffees on the market were loose, unprotected, Arbuckle Brothers protected theirs in special sealed packages. This sealed package keeps the coffee's strength, guards it from moisture and store odors. Most important of all, it makes it easy for you to be sure that you are getting the same good coffee every time you buy. You know you always get the coffee that is famous for its flavor.

So fresh, so full of strength and flavor is Arbuckles' Coffee, package after package, that there is more of it sold today than of any other packaged coffee.

Get a package, either the Whole Bean or the new Ground. Start today to know how good coffee can taste.

Make your coffee earn lovely gifts

Save the signature on every Arbuckle wrapper. Arbuckles' premiums are as famous as Arbuckles' Coffee. Send for our special premium catalog. Write today to Arbuckle Bros., 71-W2 Water St., New York.

"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.50.

Little Sir Galahad

A Novel by
The Christian Herald

"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

We will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year, and send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," for $2.50.

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page. Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of describing the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition.

These two volumes aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year postpaid, for $2.50. Or, we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. C. K. Y., Muncie, Ind. 1. Is the story of the Rich Man and Lazarus a parable? In what was the rich man wicked and Lazarus good? 2. What is meant by "God hardened Pharaoh's heart?"

1. You will find a full discussion of your first two questions in our book, "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered." Briefly, we may here say that the story is certainly a parable, and is the only one in which a proper name is employed. In the parable, the rich man represents one who neglects his duty of relieving the sufferings of others, while Lazarus stands for one of the type of helpless, hopeless, friendless poor, who are to be found all over the world, and whose lot might be greatly benefited if people of means held their wealth as a beneficent stewardship. 2. The passage in Ex. 7 : 3 refers to the heart of a sinner which, by divine permission, is allowed to steel itself against any distinction between right and wrong. In other words, when a person grows so persistent in evil-doing that he becomes blinded to the good, it can be said of him that God's restraining Spirit has been withdrawn. If men will not hear, and will not follow God's warnings against wickedness, he leaves them finally to their own devices, which always, as in the case of Pharaoh, lead to ruin and destruction.

Believer. Please explain Jer. 23 : 13.

In this chapter the prophet warns against false prophets and describes their wickedness. In the 13th verse he says that he has seen folly, that is, insipidity, unsavoriness, not having the salt of goodness, in connection with the worship of Baal. And these false prophets attempted to represent themselves as God's prophets and thus to lead men astray. In the following verse there is shown that even in Jerusalem, where the temple was and where true religion ought to prevail, the prophets had done horrible things. The whole context shows the divine displeasure at false prophecy.

T., Philadelphia, Pa. That the use of tobacco is an indulgence which could be dropped with advantage to brain, body and pocketbook, few will deny. Even its defenders—and their name is legion—can claim no merit and no benefit in the habit. The war on tobacco, to be successful, should be educational, based largely on economic and physiological grounds. From the religious viewpoint it is wasteful and wicked, a defilement of the body, which is the temple of the Spirit, and a bad example for the young. It has been proved by educators that tobacco-using students rank low in their classes, and we believe that it is a barrier to success in various forms of athletics. Thus on moral, financial, mental and physical grounds, it is a habit that should be avoided.

W. H., Burlington, Mich. For an evangelistic student the lives of Moody and Finney would be very helpful, also the volume entitled "Modern Evangelism," by M. W. Haynes. Write to Dr. Gray, Moody Institute, Chicago, for further suggestions.

W. L. G., Oxford, Fla. The word "baptize" is from the Greek root bapto, dip. The word is now applied in a broader sense, which includes all the various forms in which the sacrament of baptism is administered.

R. A. L., Irvington, N. J.: We do not think it sinful for young people to join in Hallowe'en frolics, so long as they conduct themselves seemingly. We must not take the innocent pleasures out of life. Let the young romp and play to their hearts' content—they harm no one thereby.

Reader, Fannettsburg, Pa. When you are assailed by doubts whether God will forgive you for thoughts that arise unbidden in times of physical weakness, you should turn to his Word for consolation. Our heavenly Father is kinder than we think. He not only forgives all our iniquities if we come to him repentant, but he heals our bodily ills as well. He is merciful and gracious, bestowing on us the love and pity of a father. He knows all about us, our bodily weaknesses and infirmities, and he considers our liability to temptation. Read Psalm 103 and then ask the Father, for his dear Son's sake, to give you the strength and confidence you need to overcome those fears; and he will assuredly do this, for Jesus himself has said that whatsoever we ask in his name will be given (John 14 : 13, 14). Ask believing, and hold on firmly to the promise. Remember that temptations come even to the b o men; but temptation in itself is not sin, although encouraging it or yielding t sinful. Further, for your comfort, let say here that the very fact that you are a ou and troubled about sin is an indicatio ha the Holy Spirit is still striving with yo that you are not beyond forgiveness. La ou whole trouble before God in prayer, in not only for forgiveness but for inc se faith, and for that peace of mind whic wil give no admittance to doubts and fears

1. There is nothing either in secu o sacred writings to show who were ul parents. 2. If you will compare Mark 11 12 you will notice that Jesus made a diff nc between his teaching of his disciples of ordinary people, because of the sp ua insight of the former. It would hav een useless to give the latter the direct te hin he gave the disciples, so he taught th b illustrations, in parables, or object le ons to which they would listen, and which uld remain in their minds. WILL ABANDON RUSH MEDICAL. Rush Medical College, which for a number of years has been affiliated with the University of Chicago, is to be discontinued. In its place there will be organized a medical department in the University of Chicago which will start with an endowment of $11,000,000 and which the University will endeavor to make the greatest school for the education of specialists in the United States. It is intended to create a school which will make it unnecessary for American students to go abroad to complete their studies. Before the war about 1,500 American physicians and students went annually to study medicine in Berlin and Vienna. Rush Medical College was founded seventy-five years ago.

Our Bible Picture Contest

THE publishers of the Christian Herald, realizing that those who entered the Bible Picture Contest are very anxious to know the final results, heartily appreciate the patience shown by all. The Judges are still at work on the verses submitted as answers, and although we hope to receive their decision at any time now, we are unable to state definitely just when they will advise us as to their selection of the "best" answers. The Christian Herald will do everything possible to expedite the awarding of prizes, and will announce the names of the prize-winners in the Christian Herald just as soon after the Judges announce their decision as practicable.

LET us send you, without cost, a little booklet which tells the remarkable story of Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco business man who seems to have solved the problem of prolonging youth. At 50 Mr. Bennett was partially bald, his eyes were weak, his body was worn out, broken down—he was a decrepit old man. Today, at 70, he has a thick head of hair, his eyes are remarkably strong, and he is in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete and as young as the average man at 35.

Illustrated Book Free

How Sanford Bennett accomplished these wonders by very simple excercises which he practices for about 10 minutes before arising in the morning, is told in a remarkable 400-page, profusely illustrated book, written by Mr. Bennett himself. Let us tell you what the book contains, how you can examine it without cost and more about Mr. Bennett and his miraculous experiences. If you are interested in growing younger every day instead of older, send for the free booklet today, as this announcement may not appear again. DECEMBER 1—$175 MORE

Your Last Chance to Save That on a HUDSON SUPER-SIX

All fine car makers confront the same condition as the Hudson. High-grade materials have enormously advanced. All must use lesser materials or advance the price, if their profit is now a fair one. Now is the time to decide your next year's car.

The Hudson Factory is just completing its current year's production. Some Hudson dealers have sold their year's allotment—some have not.

These are the last cars to be built from materials contracted a year ago.

On Dec. 1, we start our new production. There will be no change in models. The only changes, if any, will be minor refinements.

The materials for these coming cars will cost us vastly more than the first cars cost us. That is due to market conditions. No quality maker can escape the higher material prices now prevailing. The Hudson price must advance $175.

If your dealer can supply you a Super-Six today, you will save $175 by getting any model, open, enclosed or all-season.

Fair Warning

We announce this in simple fairness. Any Hudson dealer who has unsold cars will be very glad to keep them. He can sell them next spring at the new prices.

But, as for ourselves, we won't advance the price until our cost advances. And that is on the new production, starting December 1. Until then, your Hudson dealer, if he has cars, should sell at present prices. Go and see.

1917 Costs are Fixed

It is the custom in this line to contract materials for one year in advance. It is now essential, else car makers cannot get them.

So, whatever the coming year's conditions, the cost of fine cars will not drop. All must pay the current prices for quality materials.

Not all cars will advance, perhaps. Some makers may lower the grade of materials. Some whose profits are too high may cut them.

But all makers who use Hudson grade of materials must provide for this added cost. So the Hudson Super-Six, even at the advance, will undersell like-grade cars.

The Pinnacle Car But Not the Top Price

The Hudson Super-Six, in a hundred tests, has proved itself the greatest car built. It holds all the world's records which mean anything to owners.

It holds all the stock-car speed records. It holds the stock motor speed record of 102.53 miles per hour. It holds the 24-hour record of 1819 miles. It holds the Pike's Peak hill-climbing record—the greatest event of its kind—against 20 famous competitors.

It has twice with one car, in one continuous trip, broken all transcontinental records. It ran from San Francisco to New York and back in 10 days and 21 hours. No other car ever before attempted the round trip against time. Only the endurance of the Super-Six is equal to that run of 6972 miles—twice across America.

These things prove supreme endurance, due to an almost frictionless motor which is patented by Hudson. It cannot be imitated. And every Hudson detail—finish, luxury and quality—matches with that motor.

So the Hudson Super-Six must now be conceded the highest place in Motordom. Yet note how far it will undersell some cars, even with this advance.

But these are facts for later buyers. Today any Super-Six that is still unsold can be bought at the present price. And in the same models as next spring, save in possible small refinements. With such a saving one could well afford to even lay the car up for the winter.

See if your dealer has an unsold Super-Six.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"BUT thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet . . . and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." How many of us know fully the life-giving power of the communion of the secret place? We rush and hurry and press hard upon the heels of fleeing time in a vain effort to get things needful or desired. Even our devotions are hurried, our daily Scripture shortened, and our prayer often a breath thrown out at random in the hope that it will find its way above, where the Father waits, craving our full devotion, anxious to bless us, but separated from us by our failure to come near.

There is abundant evidence that the utter failure of our twentieth century civilization, when it faced and failed to solve the questions which precipitated the horrible war that is now raging, is driving the peoples of the world back to God.

E. P. T. asks: "In these troublous times, is it not given us to pray for world-wide conviction of sin, world-wide revival of righteousness? Perhaps God has long waited for this world-wide petition, continuing till the answer comes."

We cannot know the mind of God, nor how his Spirit will move in the affairs of men; but the Prayer League could not pray more worthily than it will in uniting its petitions to the Father, that, through his love, the will for peace may prevail in a war-maddened world.

A pastor thanks God for restored health and renewed strength for service.

A missionary in Japan sends to the Prayer League his testimony regarding the certain fulfilment of the eternal promises. Four times in recent years he and his have carried a pressing need to the Father in their family prayer. A check for one hundred yen, urgently needed for the work of the mission, once came in the afternoon mail; prayer had been made for it that morning. Money needed for the schooling of the children came promptly in answer to prevailing prayer. Later a sewing machine, long prayed for, came as an unexpected gift from a chance acquaintance; and finally the missionary, working all day to repair his old typewriter, was driven to his knees and rose to put his finger immediately upon the screw which had caused the trouble.

A. M. D. writes: "I am sorry to say that I have not had an answer to even one prayer that I have asked, not even one that I have asked often (that the minister may give up tobacco)." Sometimes prayer is not answered because we have not first used all our own powers to gain the boon sought. We wonder if A. M. D. has gone to the minister personally and has laid this habit upon his heart. Sometimes, it is said, the answer is held back to try our faith, and sometimes it fails because of the hardness of heart of the one whom we would influence through prayer. Scripture suggests that even the Spirit of God will sometimes cease to strive with men; but even the hardest of sin-hardened hearts have yielded ultimately to prevailing prayer that would not be denied. The Prayer League will unite with A. M. D. in persistent prayer that the minister in question may see the weakening effect of his habit upon his power for good and may be led to drop it for Christ's sake.

America, Syria and China, and I have still to see why the moral act of Mr. Thomas à Becket in opposing the destruction of the churches by Henry offers exceptional advantages for English study.

Does Japan Look Forward to War with Us?

Today I had a talk with a Japanese editor, after he had taken a half-hour to show me a place for which I had been hunting, with the aid of policemen, and slips of paper with the name of the place written on them in Japanese, and delivery boys. As I thanked him, he said he was glad to do it, for the Americans are good friends of the Japanese.

I asked him how the Japanese felt about the plans for an enlarged American navy. His answer was immediate and apparently sincere.

"That makes no difference. We know that America needs more ships. But she does not want war with us, and we will never fight with so fine a friend as America."

At tiffin time I picked up a paper and saw that certain American papers were indulging in insulting jingo talk. I have only been in Japan ten days this time, but during that period I have sounded everybody I could on the attitude toward America, and my conclusion so far is either that every native, missionary, United States official, and newspaper in Japan is hoodwinked or bribed by Japan, or that Japan is really friendly toward us, as she has every cause, selfish or otherwise, to be. I reserve the right to change my mind, however, as I have done before since sixteen months ago, when as a teacher in China I saw Japan force unjust demands on a helpless people. But I have come to believe that some at least of those demands were directed, not at China, but at grasping nations to whom a partition of China would be most acceptable. Persia is still on the map, but she is bound by two mighty powers with whom Japan is now allied. England and Russia have taken advantage of weaker nations more than once. Japan's acts have not been admirable or just. They have measured up to European standards, however, and Japan is still less than sixty years from her true birthday as a modern power.

The Japanese do not want war. They will avoid it if possible. But they are very proud, and the war party is ambitious. They are too poor to fight a big war. But if war seems to be their duty to protect their national honor, they will fight with the desperation of the idealist and the efficiency of the autocracy. If war comes, it will be America's fault. And if war comes it will be a big war. Japan does not harbor cowardice. This is the situation, as I have gathered it so far. It is a guess, you may say, and so is the judgment of any man on such matters; for the past two years have proven to us that war sometimes comes unbidden, and that the "Great Illusion" of the summer of 1914 is the grim reality of today.

What is Japan's offense? That she thinks herself as good as any other nation. Is this crime or undue assumption? Japan has kept her promises with us, as surely as she has broken them in regard to Asiatic matters. We should be ready to exert our influence against her, in case she takes steps in the Far East which are unjust or illegal. But our mightiest warship will not scare her; our sharpest note will not deter her from a fixed purpose. She will do right because of friendship, because she is beaten in war, or because she intends to do right anyway. She will do wrong because she wants to, and because she regards herself as a sovereign nation, able to interpret her own law and able to enforce her will on weaker nations.

If we have any real reason for keeping the Japanese out of America, let us keep them out. But if we are not willing to do something, let us stop this jangle of rusty swords and flint-lock muskets in trying to scare our courageous little yellow brother, who will be friends with us, but who will not be scared. He has self-respect.

Thirty-two years old and President of a million dollar corporation

The story of his success and how he achieved it

Three years ago a studious-looking young man—he was twenty-nine then—came to New York City. He had only a few dollars in his pocket. But his head was full of ideas and he knew business fundamentals. He entered the Pyrene Manufacturing Company as a salesman.

He wanted to grow—and he grew

He did not stay a salesman long. He wanted to grow. Because he knew business principles, he did grow. In six months he was sales-manager. Then he was put in charge of advertising.

In 1916, the President of the Pyrene Company, a million dollar corporation, resigned. The Board of Directors elected the studious-looking young man President. He had been with the Company less than two years.

Why Mr. Allen made good

This is the story of C. Louis Allen's rise from no job to the Presidency of a huge corporation at the age of thirty-two.

"He knows the principles that underlie all big business," said the directors. That is why he is an executive today, while thousands of other thirty-two-year-old men are worrying over details in their own narrow departments.

It is this broad grasp of business that the Alexander Hamilton Institute will give you. It is giving a training in big business principles to more than 40,000 wide-awake men in America today.

What Mr. Allen thinks of the Course

He says: "Several of our department and branch managers are studying your Course at my suggestion. They are the men who are creating bigger jobs in this country and fitting themselves to fill them. From reading your Course, I am convinced that it will help every man who is filling his present job and reaching for another."

The kind of men enrolled

Among the 40,000 subscribers are such men as: H. C. Osborn, President, American Multigraph Sales Co.; Melville W. Mix, President of the Dodge Manufacturing Co.; George M. Verity, President of the American Rolling Mills; William H Ingersoll, Marketing Manager of the biggest watch company in the world; N. A. Hawkins, General Sales-Manager of the Ford Motor Co.—and scores of others equally prominent.

Advisory Council

The Advisory Council includes Frank A. Vanderlip, President National City Bank; Judge Elbert H. Gary, head U. S. Steel Corporation; John Hays Hammond, the eminent engineer; Joseph French Johnson, Dean New York University School of Commerce; and Jeremiah W. Jenks, statistician and economist.

"Forging Ahead in Business"

An interesting 128-page book, "Forging Ahead in Business," will be sent to you free. Ask for it. It tells in detail what the Course and Service is, what it has done for others, and what it will do for you.

Merry Moments

When the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

An Efficient Hair-Restorer. It could hardly have been caused by old age—the man had been bald-headed, very bald-headed, for years. There had been a time when some of the innumerable preparations calculated to prevent the falling out of hair had been tried, but his hair had ceased to fall only when not even a fringe remained.

But the man was contented. He wore a wig—not a small, tight-fitting one, but a large, bushy one. But one day on the street, as a wind caught away the man's hat, his wig was snatched, too. Bareheaded, indeed, the owner made a futile grab, then waited while a small boy gave chase.

"Sonny," said the man, as he gratefully rewarded the boy, "you're the quickest hair-restorer I have ever found."

The Essence of Good Sense. Very strong peppermints are grandpa's favorite confection. One day he gave one to four-year-old Marjorie and waited slyly to see what she would say or do when she should discover the pungent flavor of the candy. A few minutes later he saw her take the partly eaten peppermint from her mouth and place it on a small table beside an open window. "What's the matter?" he asked. "Don't you like the candy?" "Oh, yes," replied Marjorie, "I like it, but I thought I'd let it cool for a little while."

Forearmed. "Now, Willis," announced mother, "tonight we are going to entertain several of the Y. M. C. A. secretaries at dinner, and unless you can behave better than usual, you will have to eat with Mary in the kitchen."

"I'll behave," asserted Willis, hastily. Mary's company was little to his liking.

The dinner progressed favorably. Willis lost his young heart to the genial guests and got along fine with only an occasional error. But while waiting for dessert, his gaze unfortunately wandered around the table. Every man, from his father down, had one or both elbows planted firmly on the cloth, while they listened to a friendly argument on ways and means.

"Elbows off!" shouted Willis in a happy consciousness of virtue (for once). "We caught 'em that time, didn't we, mother?"

A Mighty Question

The "Fresh-air" wandered o'er the farm,
 No word he said,
Though problems by the bucketful
 Crammed his small head.
One question hurt his narrow chest,
 And it must come—
"Where does the oxes and the cows Git all their gum?"

Much too Late. The agent marched up the front steps and rang the doorbell briskly. "Good morning," he said, bowing politely to the maid who answered his ring. "Is the lady of the house engaged?" "Not now," responded the new maid brightly. "She used to be, but she got married more than a year ago."

Area of Canal Zone. The total area of the Canal Zone, which includes all the land and water within five miles on either side of the center line of the canal, but does not include the area within the three-mile limit on the Atlantic and Pacific ends of the canal, is 441½ square miles, of which the land area is 332.35 square miles. The area of Gatun Lake within the five-mile limit is 106.4 miles, the area of Miraflores Lake, 1.9 miles, and the area of the canal channel itself .85 miles. The area was given in 1911 as 448 square miles, which was correct at that time, but by a treaty proclaimed February 18, 1915, an area of 6½ square miles adjoining Panama City was ceded to Panama in exchange for two small tracts, one of them in the city of Colon on which one of the defense batteries of the canal is situated. The same treaty gave the Panama Canal Administration control of all the waters of Gatun Lake outside of the five-mile limit and all land adjoining the lake up to the 100 foot contour line, adding 61 square miles to the 441½ miles within the zone, making the area of the Canal Zone and controlled territory 502½ square miles.

Dr. William H. Main, under whose leadership the Memorial Baptist Church of Philadelphia has become notable among Baptist churches, especially in its work for young people, has become pastor of the First Baptist Church in Chicago, which was served for so many years by Rev. P. S. Henson.

So much more for the money

This car sells itself to anyone who starts out to get the most for his money in a good, big, roomy, five-passenger car.

Comparison proves a plain case to anyone who cares to know.

You don't have to be an expert or have any special knowledge to determine the big extra value you get in this car.

Its advantages stand out so boldly that they cannot be overlooked in a comparison with any car selling for $795—or for a great deal more.

You get more power—35 horsepower motor—more than 250,000 in use.

You get more room—112-inch wheelbase.

You get greater comfort—long, 48-inch cantilever rear springs and 4-inch tires.

You get greater convenience—electrical control buttons on steering column.

You get bigger, safer brakes—service, 13⅜ x 2¼; emergency, 13 x 12¼.

You get better cooling—you never heard of an Overland overheating.

This is the biggest and best car we have ever been able to sell until now for less than $1000.

In fact, it's a thousand-dollar car which the economies of our enormously increased production enable us to sell for $795.

If you want the most for your money in a big, comfortable, roomy five-passenger car of long-proven mechanical superiority—here it is—no argument possible—you can determine the facts for yourself.

And back of the car is the largest and most successful automobile concern in the world that produces cars of this size and class.

And back of it also are the best established, most successful automobile dealers to be found.

You can't beat such a combination—a car that everyone knows is 100% right mechanically—a car that is priced so low that extra value sticks out all over it—a big, strong, thoroughly established concern back of the car, and a successful enterprising local dealer to do business with.

See the Overland dealer in your nearest town—he will gladly show you the car—demonstrate it—give you a prompt delivery—and render prompt, efficient service as long as you own it.

Now is the time to buy—there will be plenty of good driving weather.

And when things freeze up, put on your curtains and go anywhere comfortably in any kind of weather all winter long.

Same model, six-cylinder—35-40 horsepower—116-inch wheelbase, $925.

FOUR CAKES A SECOND

Each time the sand runs through the hour-glass 14,400 cakes of PALMOLIVE are produced. Four cakes a second—240 cakes a minute—14,400 cakes an hour—for every working day.

—This is the enormous manufacturing volume required by the popularity of PALMOLIVE SOAP!

For just as Palm and Olive oils were the indispensable cleansing agents and equipped the marble baths of ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome, so is the fragrant, wholesome cake of PALMOLIVE the indispensable equipment of the equally luxurious porcelain bath of the modern American home.

A luxury and a necessity combined; the modern perfection of a luxury ages old; this is the combination that requires four cakes a second to supply the millions that demand PALMOLIVE SOAP.

PALMOLIVE SHAMPOO—The olive oil shampoo—is as essential for proper care of the hair as is PALMOLIVE for the bath and toilet. You will find it wherever the PALMOLIVE line is sold, price 50 cents a bottle.

Our new PALMOLIVE booklet, describing the entire PALMOLIVE line, together with threefold sample package, will be mailed on receipt of 10 cents in stamps.

ELIJAH CONVENT IN THE GORGE OF THE BROOK CHERITH

The Lotus Baby

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

A LOTUS blossom bloomed one day
In sunshine and in shower;
It changed a garden far away,
Into a fairy bower;
The iris smiled to see it there,
The lilies swayed to meet it,
And butterflies, all rainbow-hued,
Came softly out to greet it.
The temple bells rang far away,
A distant silver calling;
And from the fragrant cherry trees
A rosy snow was falling.
And oh, the lotus blossom laughed
To see a world so glowing,
And folded back its petals till
Its golden heart was showing.

A LOTUS blossom bloomed one day;
The sky was blue above it;
And Fujiyama, snowy-crowned,
Seemed bending down to love it;
An old world charm was in the air,
Of sandalwood and singing;
And oh, the lotus blossom laughed,
And as its laughter, ringing,
Rose up to God, he smiled and said
That such a winsome flower
Should give its sweetness to the earth
For longer than an hour.

AND when the night came softly down,
And all the world lay sleeping,
His angels left their home above,
And, through the garden creeping,
They came to where the lotus bloomed,
And touched its heart so gleaming.
They kissed it gently with a prayer,
And left as daylight, beaming,
Swept through the misty veil of night.
And as the sun came creeping,
Where there had been a lotus bloom
It saw a baby sleeping!

Practical Thanksgiving

The Loading of a Christmas Ship for War Sufferers Points the Way to Thankful Deeds

IT is still true, and will remain true forever, that God is love. It is that eternal fact that makes Thanksgiving possible. The fact that God is love holds the world together today despite the structive forces that are doing their best to ruin his ndiwork. The love of God still shines through uman tears, as the sun through the shower, making em beautiful with the spiritual graces of faith and atience and courage and hope. If ever the world eded the warming rays of God's love to shine rough and dry human tears, it is at this Thanks- ving season in the year of our Lord 1916.

To be loaded with munitions of Peace and sent through mine-strewn seas to the succor of a war-ravaged people

AS these lines are being written a ship is loading ith Christmas gifts for the roken-hearted, homeless, arving people of Armenia nd Syria. Although this ill probably be the most elcome shipment of Christ- as gifts that could possibly sent to them, there is mething about the contents the ship that seems at st to clash with the idea of hristmas gifts. And this ery something helps us to ppreciate the condition into hich war has thrust these llow beings who dwell in e land of the Bible. If ur children, and members of ur families, our aged parents nd our neighbors one and ll were on their knees to the overnment to send them read for Christmas, just bread nd nothing more, but bread nd enough of it; bread enough r a day; for one meal; just a aste of bread once more, a aste of bread on Christmas Day as a Christmas gift—if e by hundreds of thousands had been forced by the weep of fighting armies in our land to take refuge in elds and forest, and there, in the early blasts of inter, huddled together, shivering and afraid, we ried to God himself that if just a morsel of bread ight be put into the mouths of our little children, ur Christmas Day would be blessed—if we can magine ourselves in such a plight, we can appreciate hat it will mean to these Armenians and Syrians on hristmas Day to receive thousands of barrels of lour, several million pounds of wheat, thousands of ounds of lima beans, rice, sugar, condensed milk. nd with such treasures is the Christmas ship being oaded as these lines are being written.

The Christmas ship is to be the United States navy ollier Cæsar, which is selected because the govern- nent is sending her with a small shipment of coal o the United States ship Des Moines, at present in the lediterranean. The principal cargo of the Cæsar, however, will be the Christmas supplies made possible by the national response to the appeal of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, which went out coupled with the President's proclamation appointing October 21 and 22 as special days for this purpose. The winter's campaign in behalf of Armenian and Syrian sufferers was thus launched on those days, and, as already noted in the Christian Herald in a letter from the Armenian Committee, the first large check received in response to that appeal was one for $15,000 drawn on the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War. The need is so acute in Armenia and Syria, the cheer and encouragement which is bound to be carried by the Christmas ship are so in keeping with the spirit of our readers, that we have added $5,000 to the original $15,000 in order to give you as large a share as possible in the provisioning of the Cæsar. This total of $20,000, the committee advises, will be devoted to the purchase of the following supplies in the name of Christian Herald readers: 1,500 bushels of whole wheat, 1,500 barrels of flour, 20,000 pounds of rice, 600 cases of condensed milk for children—enough, in all, to keep soul and body together in 70,000 persons a week, or in 500,000 for a day.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD knows of no current event more deserving of notice at this time than this of the getting ready a Christmas ship to express the good will of America to those who have been robbed of all they possessed by war. The sufferings of innocent noncombatants who, in fancied security, have had the misfortune to live within the areas of actual military operations, constitute indeed the biggest news subject of the day. The fact that this terrible misery continues and increases and has already occupied the attention of the world almost as long as has the war, increases rather than diminishes the importance of the subject. At a time in the history of the world when civilization, Christian civilization, is supposed to have put its impress on practically every land, to find whole races thrust out of the affairs of life and forced to implore foreign nations to preserve them from extinction, is a world-event that must claim the serious consideration of every right-minded individual until the unspeakable wrong has been corrected. What undertaking, aside only from that of bringing a race to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ, can equal that of preserving a people from destruction?

The reality and the vastness of the menace which hangs over the heads of the Armenians, Syrians, Serbians, Belgians, Poles, and portions of populations of other countries, was graphically set forth in the Christian Herald of last week. Let us recapitulate the startling figures compiled by George T. Webb, D.D., in that issue.

In Belgium, 3,000,000 destitute people, about one-half of the inhabitants of that kingdom, drawing a daily ration of one meal, consisting of three slices of bread and a pint of soup. In northern France, 2,112,000 people, a large proportion of them women and children, barefoot, suffering from lack of clothing and nourishment. In Serbia, 5,000,000 people deprived of their living and of any chance to make it; 5,000 children orphaned in the last two years. In Poland, 11,000,000 homeless wanderers, mostly women and children, shelterless, hungry, exposed to disease. In East Prussia, a multitude whose numbers can only be estimated, in a condition too dreadful to contemplate. In Armenia, or rather we should say from Armenia, 1,175,000 refugees, many of them children, scattered in all that region, suffering from treatment that seems unbelievable, destitute of means to help themselves. In Albania, the spectacle of a nation dying of hunger, in numbers exceeding the Armenians, a population that will be wiped out by famine and pestilence unless help is forthcoming speedily. Over 25,000,000 people are included in this summary, all of them in extreme destitution and helplessness. What a chapter

Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—EIGHTH LETTER

Miss Louise Imhof, superintendent of Senda Orphanage

A deaf and dumb castaway of whose antecedents nothing is known

The Tou.h of a Tiny Hand

IT was the touch of a tiny hand that made me feel the need of the Sendai Christian Orphanage. Twice I had stopped off in the Edinburgh of Japan, to spend a day at the home of the hundred or so children who are all that there are funds for, although the plant is capable of caring for twice as many.

Knowing that the readers of the Christian Herald had helped very largely in tho development of this orphan work at the timo of the great famine in the northeast provinces several years ago, I felt all the more keenly interested to see how it had progressed.

Captain Luke W. Bickel, who is known to every missionary in Japan, personally or by reputation, is a most careful man in his statements. He told me, "There are two institutions in Japan of whose worth and need you need not question. They are the Okayama Orphanage and the Sondai Christian Orphanage." Others had told me that the work was a much needed ono and that it was most economically administored. I had met Miss Imhof, the beloved superintendent, whose circuit of the grounds is a benediction on the entiro plant, and I had watched the children at work and play. I had lined them up for a shasin, or photograph, and had seen the cottages, the class-rooms, the dining-room and the hospital.

Everything I found was neat but simple. It was very evident that economy was practiced, and there were only half as many children as there might be if there were more money. Living is becoming more expensive in Japan, so that now it requires thirty dollars a year to provide a home to a child and to feed, educate, clothe it and nurse it when it is sick. I made up my mind that unless I could so feel the value of the work that I would be impelled to give something personally, I would make no appeal to any one else for a single penny. Now, the Sendai Christian Orphanage is not the kind of institution that attracts large funds. The people who give to it support one child, possibly two, but no more. There is no attempt to compete with any other institution of its kind, or to furnish statistics that will show big progress from year to year. It is there to minister to a need, and when the happy day comes when hungry little stomachs are fed, and fatherless and motherless children are cared for by some other means, the Sendai Christian Orphanage will close its doors.

In recognition of the fine work the Orphanage is doing, the Japaneso government is now extending to it considerable financial assistance. All the missionarios praise it. But with room for two hundred children, it has only half that number, because the widows and orphans in Belgium and Armenia, who perhaps need assistance even more, aro being aided by the good people who have formerly helped the work in Sendai.

We had had a meeting of song and worship. One sweet-voiced boy had sung a Christian hymn. The "foreigner," who had come all the way from Now York, and who had even been to Karafuto, had said a few words of cheer, and, after disbanding, we had gone down into the dimly lighted hall below. As I walked along in the half-light, a small hand reached out and touched mine. In a flash, the understanding of the thing came over me. This small boy of six or seven was one of the children of the home, and he had reached out to me, as he so often had to Miss Imhof, or to the other workers or his house-mother, expecting a loving touch in return. That was what the Christian Orphanage meant to him—just love and tenderness and sympathy. He had no worry for statistics or problems of administration. Those things were takon care of for him, and all that home meant to his lonely soul was lovo and affection. I had approached the matter from the wrong angle. I looked upon the Orphanage as a business proposition, as a needed charity. But he looked on it as father and mother, friend and teacher—home!

It was very easy then to take tho tiny hand in mine and to pat the little fellow's head. It would have been hard not to. But when that little hand touched mine, at that moment I decided to do my bit for this worthy work. My prejudice against making appeal to others was given up, and because the work is good and the need great, I feel justified in making appeal to those who can give to this particular object, without giving less to struggling Europe.

Think of mothers despising the joy of giving a little lad his bath—and think of these little lads who know no mother's touch

At tho Sendai Orphanage, the most careful investigation is made of every case before a child is taken in. The institution is not exclusively an orphanage, as it has in it many children who might be better off if they had no relatives at all. But the Orphanage is not encouraging pauperism by taking in children who can be supported by those whose duty it is to caro for them. With its small supply of funds, only the most worthy cases can be accepted.

Investigation sometimes brings out most dramatic stories. One day a local officer brought a child to the Orphanage and tried to have it cared for. The rule of the Orphanage is to accept the rocommendation of only provincial officers, as they have the means of getting at tho facts in the case. Investigation was made in this case, and the facts were peculiar. On the death of the father of tho child, the mother, who was desperately poor, sold her husban body to the governmont for the medical colle This transaction was carried on through a lo government officer who, when he got the money the body, spent it in dissipation, and then, know that he had deprived the child of a chance to li brought it to the Orphanage. When the mother consulted and she had learned the facts, she clu desperately to the child, whose support would b heavy burden, and pleaded that it should not taken from her. Of course it was not. This sort thing is not uncommon in Japan, and shows undercurrent of barbaric thought and a point of vi which we cannot comprehend, and which no amou of wisdom and excuses on the part of the think classes, whose hopes sometimes cloud their judgme can explain away. Japan is struggling tow the light; but there is an old and dark und current in its life that carries suffering a torture to many a helpless soul.

Handicapped as it is by lack of funds, Orphanage is compelled to refuse entrance many who should be received. Here is illustration.

One father is sick from an incurable disea His wife is weak, and unable to support h self and husband and at the same time ca for her three small children. Sorrowful the thought of losing contact with the cl dren, who were her sole inspiration to ke on amid insuperable difficulties, she ask that they might be taken in at the Orpha age. But there was not in the Orphana treasury even tho twenty-five conts a d which would provide for these three childr so they could not be received. But M McCord of the Orphanage staff conceived plan which he is now using in larger measu By giving to the family each week the amou of rice and barley that the three childr would eat if they were in the Orphanage, t unity of the home was preserved, and t weary mother enabled to keep her home gether and have her little ones beside h Theso three kiddies are each costing some Chr tian friend two cents a day for enough sim food to fill their hungry stomachs. Yet there a those who say that missions and charitable instit tions waste the money entrusted to them!

One Japanese Christian is a poor man who de in rice. He cannot afford to give to the Orphanage well as to his church, so he sells rice to the Orphana at cost. In this way, the home saves ten cents a da

Render Unto Caesar

By MARY McCRAE CULTER

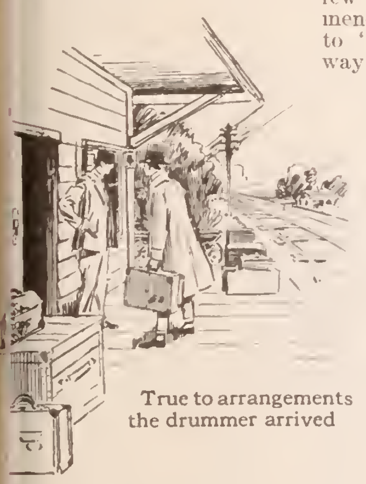
" see the Thanksgiving Proclamation is out," remarked Mrs. Rev. Harry Stevenson, turning the pages of her favorite paper. "Has the Ministerial Association made any arrangements fo he service this year?"

Not as yet," replied the minister. "We shall pably take the matter under consideration this eving."

I suppose services will be held in the Methodist ch, as our church was the last meeting-place, and th other churches have had their turn in recent ys. No doubt the new Baptist minister will be cd upon to preach the sermon," the lady mused. H husband had already forgotten the subject in his inrest in an article in his favorite monthly.

I am so tired of the ordinary observance of T nksgiving," the monologue went on. "It is such a ce—a service attended by a few faithful saints, a few children and men-folks who go to 'get out of the way' of those who are working themselves to death over the annual feast at home, and by people who hope to receive an eleventh-hour invitation to some neighbor's dinner.



True to arrangements the drummer arrived

"I wish we could have a new kind of Thanksgiving Day—a real thanksgiving day."

She dropped t paper into her lap and considered the subject f every standpoint.

he Rev. Harry Stevenson and his young wife had b favorites of the people of the town, regardless of rch affiliation, almost from the beginning of their fi years' residence, and were, therefore, well acqinted with conditions that existed between congregons as well as between individuals, which gave t n an advantage over their more recently arrived a ciates.

o it was with a comprehensive knowledge of Santa rena and its three thousand inhabitants that Mrs. ry Stevenson began her consideration of "a new d of Thanksgiving, which would be a real thanksgng day."

Let me see," she murmured. "What would make more thankful than anything else that could hap to me?"

he considered the question for several minutes; n a light broke over her face, and her musical laugh led through the room.

Ier husband looked up from his magazine inquirily. "What is the cause of this merriment?" he ed genially.

'I was merely laughing at my own thoughts," Mrs. venson replied. "No," in answer to the question is eyes, "I am not going to enlighten you now. I st consult the feminine Ministerial Association t. It concerns our coming Thanksgiving services."

'Ah!" he exclaimed. "You are more than welcome deal with them. I am utterly weary of trying to ke them what they are intended to be and what y should be—services of true thanksgiving and ise to God."

FEW minutes later, there was a most animated conversation in the living-room of the Methodist sonage; and as a result, phone calls were given to remaining four ministers' wives of the town, who mptly responded to the invitation. For more n an hour these six intensely interested, publicrited plotters held a most animated and gleeful sion, from which each lady went home to lay a ll-matured plan before her husband, that he might prepared to consider it with his ministerial brethren the meeting of the association that evening.

The plan was evidently quite as attractive to these ntlemen as it had been to their wives—if one might lge by the way in which it was received and dissed that evening.

As a consequence, six sermons were preached in six lpits the following Sabbath, all from the same text: ender unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and to God the things that are God's."

These sermons formed the chief topic for conversan at the Sabbath dinner tables of the town, and cupied the increasing attention of even the loungers out the Plaza and the railroad station during the ek-days that followed.

"There is more common sense in it than in anything else I have heard lately," said one man. "I haven't been to a Thanksgiving service for ten years that was worth attending. But this—it's the greatest scheme I've heard of for years."

"Yes," responded the editor of one of the town papers, "it is the greatest thing for a scoop that I have struck for a long time. It has already caught the attention of the city dailies on my exchange list, and they applaud the idea."

"It is going to boom real estate, too," remarked one of the partners of a leading agency, "for if the plan is successful it will draw the attention of the whole United States to our town, and make people consider Santa Morena the kind of place in which to locate."

"And what is this 'common-sense plan,' this 'greatest scheme,' this boom promoter, in which you are all taking such an interest, may I ask?" questioned a traveling salesman, who chanced to be within hearing of the conversation.

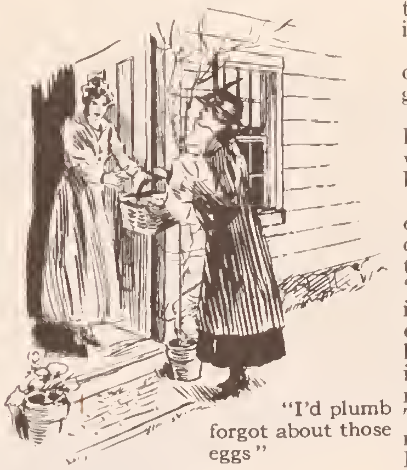
"It is a simple enough scheme, which has been proposed as a proper observance of Thanksgiving Day, and which—if carried out as proposed and desired—will make next Thursday the most interesting 'special day' which Santa Morena has ever enjoyed. The idea has been taken up by the Ministerial Association, who urge that it be strictly observed by every individual in the place," replied the editor.

"Yes, yes," interrupted the drummer impatiently.

"Well," said the station-master, "here's the idea in a nutshell: 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's,' and after that everybody will be in a proper frame of mind to 'render unto God the things that are God's.' Our pastors have urged us to make next Thursday morning a regular 'Take-it-back Day.'"

"Oh," laughed the drummer, "I see! I see! Take back the eggs and the flour and the sugar and the books and the umbrellas that have been long overdue. I imagine the lengthy procession—the running to and fro like ants that are moving their nest. How interesting!"

"And that is not all," interrupted the editor in his turn. "There is the money that has been borrowed; the interest that is overdue."



"I'd plumb forgot about those eggs"

"Yes, and the debts that have gone by default."

"And the harsh, unkind words that have been spoken."

"Oh!" exclaimed the drummer thoughtfully, "I reckon the idea hits us all, doesn't it? I believe I'll make it handy to run down here Thanksgiving morning — after I do a little take-it-back stunt of my own. I'd like to see the outcome of this scheme."

"Do come," responded the editor heartily. "I invite you to dinner at my house. We are to have a big Thanksgiving party there, and you will have good opportunity to hear the results of the plan."

"Thanks. I'll be on hand in due season. Look for me on the early train. Good-by."

HE swung himself on to the Limited, found a comfortable seat in the chair-car, and sat down—only to think of Santa Morena's new idea for observing Thanksgiving Day.

"I'll write to Jim tonight and send him a check for that fifty dollars I borrowed of him five years ago. I'll venture to say the old boy needs it, if crops are as bad back at home as the newspapers tell us. The letter will just reach him Thursday morning if I send it tonight, and that will give him at least that much to be thankful for. I feel as if I would be thankful myself. It's worth a good deal to have a clear conscience, anyway."

"What have I to take back?" murmured Miss Tracy, who lived alone in the big house up on the hill above town. "I never borrow. I do not need to. I always pay my debts. I never gossip about my neighbors. What is there for me in this 'Render unto Cæsar' idea?"

She sat in silent contemplation for a long time, but could see no part for a person like herself to take in what had developed into a most enthusiastically popular movement.

She looked out of her window on her spacious and perfectly kept grounds, and through the open door of the garage she beheld her man-of-all-work polishing the panels of her limousine.

"How faithful and careful James is!" she exclaimed. "How fortunate I am to have secured his services! I wonder—really, I do not remember that I ever have told him how much I appreciate his faithfulness! And Lucy, and old Aunt Hulda! What an ungrateful creature I have been! 'Tribute unto Cæsar' . . . "

"HARSH, unkind words!" meditated Mrs. Ferguson, who was noted as one of the gossips of the town. "I wonder whether preacher Stevenson was thinking of me when he put that into his sermon. Well," defensively, "I dunno as I ever said a word about Martha Sullivan that she didn't plumb deserve. 'Tain't my fault if she won't keep her chickens where they belong; and when she tells tales on her neighbors it's only right that she gets what's comin' to her. But—well—I dunno—maybe I'd ought to overlook the chickens, seein' as she run the Simmons pigs out of my yard an' fastened up the gate when I was away this fall. Come to think of it, I never even thanked her for it; an' that ain't bein' even decently polite. If I must say it, I do owe that much 'unto Cæsar.'"

"Harsh, unkind words," the phrase which Rev. Mr. Stevenson had used in his Sabbath sermon, appeared to be "the arrow shot at a venture" which hit more marks than any of his other suggestions. It sent pretty Rose Hunter and Herbert Wilson to their respective homes with the same thought stirring their hearts.

They had been so excessively happy in their engagement, and had gone so far in their plans for the cozy home that was to have been ready before the wedding day, which had been set for Thanksgiving, until that unlucky evening when he was tired and she was nervous. He had insisted that she wanted "a good old-fashioned pantry" in her home-to-be, and she had declared that such things were "too out-of-date for anything," and that a built-in kitchen was the only sensible thing to have. She had condemned him for being "overbearing" and "set in his ways," and he had said that she was "too finicky for him," and they had both grown more and more unreasonable, until his ring had been returned to his pocket, and they had separated "for good and all." That had been six months previous. As Mr. Stevenson was preaching that memorable sermon, Rose had cast a sly glance up at the choir where Herbert sat beside the pretty alto singer. He had never looked so handsome, so dear, as he did then, leaning toward his pretty neighbor to speak a brief word about the anthem.

And Thanksgiving Day was so near!

The girl could not bear another glance, but sat with her eyes upon her hymnbook while the minister preached that sermon on "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." It was all very well so long as he spoke about returning borrowed property, and paying bad debts, and making just returns for benefits received; and even when he began on "harsh and unkind words" it applied so perfectly to, well—several notable gossips. Presently, however, the minister touched upon the quarrels and misunderstandings that so frequently arise in families and between friends, and showed how such things as these kill the spirit of Thanksgiving, and close lips that should be filled with praise to God.

"How can you enter upon a true Thanksgiving Day, O my people," asked the minister, earnestly, "with hatred in your hearts or with bitterness on your lips and with the memory of unkind words to sting your consciences? If you would make next Thursday what you would most want it to be, put these things from you, take back the harsh criticism, the unkind words, and see whether God will not reward you for your victory over self."

"What did it matter, anyway," thought a very serious Herbert, "how the new house was built, if she was not to fill it with her sweet presence? What a fool he had been! 'Take back?' And 'make Thanksgiving what he would most desire it to be?' Hurrah for Cæsar!"

Britain Holds Blacklist Legal. The British reply to the American note of July 28 regarding the blacklist of American firms was received by Ambassador Page on October 12. The note was printed and was forwarded by the ambassador to Washington by mail, being made public on November 14. Great Britain claims that in preparing the blacklist she was only exercising a sovereignty over her own citizens which was entirely within her rights. Persons of enemy nationality throughout the world had been found giving active aid to the causo of their native country, and Great Britain, the noto contends, could protect herself only by limiting the activities of these persons. Earl Grey stated that tho idea seemed to be prevalent in some quarters that the end of the war was in sight, and that nothing which happened in distant countries could affect the ultimate result. He says: "If that were really the position, it is possible the measures taken by His Majesty's government might be described as uncalled for, but it is not. Even though the military situation of the Allies has been greatly improved, there is still a long and bitter struggle in front of them." Earl Grey also took pains to explain that there was no attempt to further British commerce in restricting neutrals, since the commerce of a British subject with a neutral citizen is profitable both to the British subject and to Britain herself, and Britain could not restrict commerce in which she is interested without loss to herself.

No Peace Prize In 1916. It was announced on November 10 from Stockholm that tho Swedish Academy of Sciences had decided not to distribute this year the 1916 Nobel prizes for peace, physics and chemistry. The Nobel prize for literature for 1915, which had been held in reserve, was awarded to Romain Rolland, a French playwright and novelist. The prize for literature for 1916 was awarded to the Swedish poet, Verner Heidenstam.

To Revise Interstate Commerce Law. The Newlands Joint Congressional Committee to investigate conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerco and the feasibility of government ownership of railroads, express companies, and telephone, telegraph, cable and wireless facilities will begin its sessions November 20. The investigation will be thorough. The railroads are expected to fight before the commission for such an amendment of existing laws as will place all interstate traffic exclusively under Federal control.

Conquering the White Plague. According to the mortality census of the United States for 1915, issued November 11, the death rate for the whole country from tuberculosis decreased in the last ten-year period from 200.7 per hundred thousand to 145.8. A marked reduction was also noted in the number of accidental deaths in 1915 over the two preceding years, figures being, 1913, 54,011; 1914, 51,770; 1915, 51,406. Deaths and injuries from railway accidents in 1915 totaled 6,652; deaths and injuries in street-car accidents numbered 1,555; deaths and injuries in automobile accidents numbered 3,978. The total number of deaths duc to the use of firearms was 7,994.

The Kingdom of Arabia. Grand Shereef Hussein Ben Ali of Arabia notified the nations of the world November 11 that he was the first king of the Arabian nation, and requested recognition as such. Since tho secession of Arabia is a part of the general seething tumult of war, it is not expected that recognition will be granted to the new state until a peace treaty has reestablished international relations.

Canada's New Governor. The Duke of Devonshire arrived in Canada from England Novomber 11 and was at once installed as Canada's new Governor General, the ceremony taking place in the Legislative Council Chamber in Halifax, Nova Scotia. The Duke was accompanied by the Duchess and their two daughters.

Judge Landis Levies Fines. On November 11 Federal Judge Landis of Chicago assessed fines totaling $171,000 against Swift & Company and a number of railroads which had been convicted of violating the Interstate Commerce Act. Swift & Company were fined $60,000, Big Four Railroad $70,000 in two cases, Pennsylvania Railroad $20,-600, and the Chicago Outer Belt Lino $20,000. Smaller fines were also assessed against other railroads concerned.

Sunday for Two Months in Boston. Evangelist William A. Sunday opened his campaign in Boston on November 12. The campaign is expected to cover two months, and the results of the preliminary work indicated that the city would be reached to its farthest corner. The tabernacle seats 15,100, and is said to be the largest yet built for him. In the campaign recently closed in Detroit, 27,109 persons were registered as penitents, 3,133 of whom "hit the trail" on the last day of the campaign. George Sunday has opened offices in New York City from which the work of preparation for the New York campaign will be directed. The New York tabernacle will occupy tho site of the old American League Baseball park at Broadway and Ono Hundred and Sixty-eighth Street.

Fire Prevention Pays. The a- tional Board of Fire Underwri s announced on November 9 the res s of fire prevention work in five Amer n cities. In New York in 1915 there e 1,010 fewer fires than in 1914, d losses decreased $2,460,793. In Chic o there were 1,238 fewer fires in 1 5, and losses decreased $906,605. Bos n showed a decrease of 64 per cent n fires in two years; Cincinnati, a decr se of 20 por cent. in fires and nearly y per cent. in losses. Milwaukee d 29 per cent. less fires. And lest e should cease our efforts because of is magnificent showing, we are remin d that of the total fire loss of 1915, wl h is placed at $39,591,227, $6,322 3 was directly tracoable to defec e chimneys and flues.

Shadows of Coming Events. l- lowing the action of the Union Pa ic Railroad, it was announced that ll the railroads in the country were un d in a determination to restrain the n- forcement of the Adamson Eight H r Law. Facing this situation, the Br a- erhoods have let it be known at the striko vote taken last summe is still valid and that tho Brotherh ls will go out on strike if tho law does t become effective on January 1.

Dissolving the "Glucose Tru " Federal District Judge Learned H d on Novomber 13 handed down the f al decree in the government's suit aga st the Corn Products Refining Compa y, which had been found guilty of bei a trust. The decision orders the diss - tion of the company along lines to e suggested by the Federal Trade C - mission and approved by the co t. The War in Europe

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

ON Thursday, November 9, the German chancellor made an announcement which may prove to be historic as regards the position of the German government on the general subject of the peace of the world after the lusion of the war. Referring to the question of an internal league for the preservation of peace, Dr. von Bethmann-weg said:

Ve never cond our doubts her peace would uaranteed permaly by international nizations such as ration courts. I not discuss the retical aspects of problem in this . But from the lpoint of matter ct we, now and in e, must define our ion with regard to question.

f at and after the of the war the d will only become conscious of the ifying destruction ife and property, through the e of humanity will ring out a for peaceful arements and underdings which, as far ithin human power will avoid the n of such a monis catastrophe, this will be so powerful so justified that ust lead to some t.

Germany will hon- cooperate in exation of every avor to find a tical solution, and collaborate for its ible realization."

is acceptance by nany, officially, of principles outlined the American orzation, the League for Enforcing Peace, which principles received the approbation of the President of the United es in public addresses, as well as a pledge of support in the -official statements of Viscount Grey and Lord Bryce on lf of the British government, promises much for the re tranquillity of the world.

s to the prospects of peace in a short time in the present these cannot, at this writing, in spite of the rumors in circulation during the past week, be regarded as particu- bright; nor is the military situation yet sufficiently ed to afford both sides a chance to initiate negotiations h will, to use the Chinese phrase, "save the face" of both of combatants; and until some situation, either ical, economic, or military, is arrived at which will it that rather difficult operation to be performed, ntil one side or the other is definitely crushed, peace is a chimera.

R the first days of the period under consideration, the Picardy front of the western battle line was, on whole, quiet. This was, however, merely the calm eding the storm.

his storm broke November 13 on the extreme herly end of the British line. Except in the first s of the Allied offensive last July, there has been no vity north of the river Ancre, which since then has e to be taken by common consent as the northerly dary of the Allies' offensive. At the start of the offensive, the British captured two towns north of river, St. Pierre Divion and Beaumont-Hamel, but subsequently driven out by German counter-ats, since which time these towns have remained in man hands.

n Monday, November 13, however, the British n an offensive north of the river on a front about miles long, and hit the German lines hard in that on. The advance began in the very early morning, in a few hours the British had taken for the second St. Pierre Divion, as well as the German first and nd line trenches at various points. On the southerly of the five-mile front the Germans appear to have surprised to a degree, and their defense was hardly trong as might have been expected, particularly in of the fact that the positions they occupied were ngly fortified.

he following day, Tuesday, the British advance inued in the region immediately north of the re, and the village of Beaucourt finally fell into r hands, the British line advancing slightly beyond he east. Beaumont-sur-Ancre is the first station on railroad from Albert to Arras, to the east of and ut a mile from St. Pierre Divion. The following s until this record closes were spent by the British consolidating their positions in the newly won nd.

uesday the Germans launched an attack in force on French on both portions of the Somme front. th of the Somme this attack extended on a north south line from Les Bœufs to Bouchavesnes. After erate and long-continued fighting, the Germans ed ground in the north and west of the tactically ortant St. Pierre Vaast wood, but elsewhere the nch line held firm.

AN appeal was made during the week—in the British press—by the well-known French military writer, Captain Philippe Millet, to Great Britain. After stating that it is necessary to speak plainly, Captain Millet continues by asserting "that the alliance between Great Britain and France cannot be based on a mere exchange of compliments, and that all Frenchmen are wondering whether the English fully realize what is happening in France."

It is pointed out that the British are now holding 150 kilometers of the western front, compared to 580 kilometers held by the French; and the statement is made, supported by the utterances of French deputies whom Captain Millet cites, "that the time has come for the British army to relieve the French more efficiently; and," the captain concludes, "there is not one village in France where the people do not expect our friends to enable us, after twenty-seven months of hard struggle, to have some rest during the third winter."

The application to the American government by the newly created independent Arabian state for recognition will not, it seems probable, be immediately granted. The limits ascribed to this new state by its promoters are from the Sea of Oman to the Mediterranean, from the Tigris, as far as its junction with the Euphrates, and thence from the Euphrates to the Suez Canal.

At the present time not one-twentieth of this territory is in possession of that puppet king, the Grand Shereef of Mecca, who, as my readers will remember, recently started a revolution under British and French auspices against the authority of Turkey at Mecca, which afterward spread to Medina. For its ultimate success this revolution depends on the support which may be given to it by the populations of the Arabian peninsula, and this support is rather doubtful.

The relations between Norway and Germany are reported to have undergone a change for the better. Berlin reports that the situation in Ireland is again becoming very strained, and that collisions are taking place between the Sinn Feiners and the British recruiting officers. All of which is extremely interesting, but it would be even more so to know how Berlin gets any information concerning the internal situation of Ireland.

ON the Russian front the only incident of more than ordinary importance during the week was a drive against the center of the Russian line on November 10, wherein the Germans conquered the Russian positions on a two-and-a-half-mile front. This attack, which also resulted in the capture of 3,500 prisoners and much artillery, took place near Skrobowa, twelve miles northeast of Barnovichi.

In Galicia, later in the week, the Russians admitted a defeat to the southeast of Lemberg, and the loss of considerable ground. Russian attacks on the German positions on the east bank of the Narayuvka, to the east of Halicz, were unsuccessful.

From the interior of Greece nothing more important than that Venizelos presented a flag to a regiment his government had raised at Salonica, or than that King Constantine and the royal family had been given a dinner by the diplomatic representatives of the Entente powers at Athens, reached us.

The Macedonian front was very quiet all the early part of the week, owing to weather conditions, but about the middle hard fighting again began between the Bulgar-Teuton and the Franco-Serb armies, in the region of the bend in the Cerna River south of Monastir, and the battle gradually extended to the westward in the direction of Kenali.

The results of this three or four days' fighting seem to be that the Franco-Serbs made gains of some importance north of the Cerna, and occupied the village of Cegel. They also captured a couple of thousand prisoners and some artillery, according to their bulletins, which it is fair to say are denied in their main assertions by the Teutons. In the center and on the right wing of this front the Allies were inactive.

The submarines have been very active during the past week, and many vessels are reported to have been sunk by them. A debate in the House of Lords late in the week on the subject of submarines attracted considerable attention. Baron Sydenham opened the discussion by inviting the government to make a "ton for ton" declaration in behalf of Great Britain and her allies, as a reply to "the monstrous proceedings" of the submarines, and stated that there was an uneasy feeling in the country that the submarine menace was more serious than the authorities were willing to admit. Lord Crewe for the government made the common-sense observation that it was useless to threaten to exact particular reparations in terms of peace "unless we are able to obtain those terms by obtaining a complete victory."

THE Austro-Italian front presented little of interest during the week, bad weather everywhere and snow in the mountains being responsible for this inactivity. Hence on the south Tyrol front, which is entirely in the higher Alps, occasional duels were the sum total of hostilities.

On the Carso front, south of Gorizia, the Italians reported minor gains. On the whole, we may consider the situation on the Austro-Italian front unchanged from that of last week.

On the northeastern and northern Rumanian front the situation for the past few days has been steadily though slowly growing worse for the Rumanians. On the northeast front the Russians and Rumanians have been driven back through the Georgeny Mountains

A Thanksgiving Day Sermon

BY PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON*

TEXT—Phil. 4:11. "I have learned, whatever my outward experiences, to be content."

A SUPERFICIAL view of the outward world creates a superficial view of the inward world of man; and at no time in history has there been more danger of this than at the present. The world is warswept and greed-mad. Amusement and pleasure-loving tread the very walk of the Lord's house. Divorce and infidelity threaten the foundations of the home. Vulgarity and coarseness cheapen the recreations of the young people. False definitions of patriotism and country create selfishness and race prejudice; and it is easy to say what a good man in my own church said to me the other day: "What is there to be thankful about in such a world as this? What hope is there for such a world? It is getting to the place where it is worse every day; it is retrograding. The President's proclamation is a farce. So are the proclamations of the governors of the states. They contain words, but what else? How can a man be thankful in a world that is going to pieces?"

But, in the first place, the world is not going to pieces; that is, if we believe in a great and loving God, we cannot believe he created a universe for the purpose of letting it be destroyed, the final end of all his creative power. And it is not possible to think that Jesus Christ is going to fail in his power to "draw men up to himself." If we look far enough ahead we must see victory, not defeat, for God, in the final accomplishment of a better world and in the conquering power of his Son.

TO test the thankful spirit in my own parish, I asked twenty-five or thirty men and women in every walk of life, from laborer to college professor, to give the one reason why they were thankful this year. The answers, honestly given, may indicate similar answers that a majority of Christian people might give.

For health and a good husband. (This answer was given by six persons.)

I am thankful we are not at war. (This answer was given by five persons.)

The joy of Christian living.

I am thankful for opportunity for service.

Thankful for my friends.

Thankful for hope.

Thankful for free speech.

I am thankful for an awakened interest in Christ as a personal Saviour, and a new belief in spiritual realities.

Thankful each day for my hope in Christ and eternal life.

I am thankful for the church, that is, broadly speaking, for what the organized church and its people have done and are doing for me.

Thankful for the happy home life—love of wife and children—and the ever-present love of the Father, who has been with me and my loved ones this past year, giving us comfort in bereavement, and supplying our daily needs.

I am specially thankful that my children are doing so well, and that one of them has chosen the Christian ministry this year.

Thankful that we live only a day at a time, and that with every day is provision for its need.

Thankful for work, health, and Christian friends.

Thankful for the love of Christ.

Thankful I can attend the worship of God without opposition.

I am thankful for a worth-while place to work, and for a full recognition of my efficiency by those who have the right to judge.

Thankful that God shows me my weaknesses and helps me to overcome them. I am thankful for the companionship of those who are working with me in Christian effort.

I am most thankful for the ability to perform my daily duties.

Thankful for the love of friends and of the heavenly Father.

I am thankful for the satisfactory conditions in our own land compared with those elsewhere.

Thankful for an increasing consciousness of the guiding presence and love of God.

Among other good things that have come to me this year, I am very thankful for the help that has come to me through our own church.

THESE are what might fairly be called average reasons for thanksgiving. They might be given by any similar number of people in any state of this union. But aside from that fact, it is interesting to note these facts about the answers:

Not one of the answers bases the reason for thankfulness on outward physical conditions except in the matter of health of the body. The real reasons for thanksgiving are within a higher realm. This does not mean that the health of the body is a small affair; it only indicates the eternal truth that our best sources of contentment and happiness are conditioned on our own right relation to God and his righteousness.

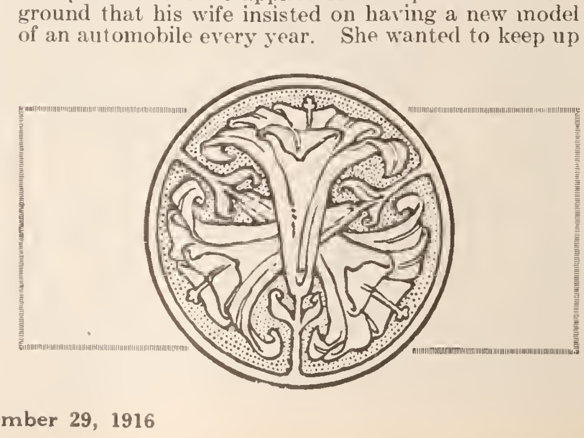
No one of the persons giving a reason for thankfulness was thankful because he was rich, or handsome, or talented. I wonder if those who would fall into that catalogue would give such facts as the greatest reason for thankfulness.

The largest number recognized the divine hand in human affairs. In other words, real thanksgiving always includes a thought of the other world. It is a sure sign of the proof of the divine, for when man is at his best, when he is most normal, he involuntarily thinks of God as a partner in his best life, and looks to him as its first cause.

THERE are, therefore, conditions to a thankful spirit, which we may well consider. A few weeks ago two men, rivals in the sale of motor cars, ran over and killed a man on one of the main streets of Topeka. They knew they were breaking an ordinance of the city in speeding. They knew they were risking the lives of pedestrians in breaking the law. And yet, in their selfish disregard of others' rights, they broke the law and committed manslaughter. An innocent young life was wiped out and a happy family circle broken.

Such men cannot know a thankful spirit until they fall on their knees and confess their sin against humanity. A thankful spirit cannot exist in a guilty conscience.

The thankful spirit cannot exist unless there is a right sense of proportion of values. The people who are basing their happiness on riches, or talent, or things, are, as a rule, the most discontented people in the world. A case came up in a divorce court recently where a man applied for a separation on the ground that his wife insisted on having a new model of an automobile every year. She wanted to keep up with the procession in society in high life, and was unhappy and discontented unless she could have the most expensive article to be bought, regardless of any real need. Such people cannot be thankful; their sense of thankfulness is buried under an exaggerated sense of the value of things.



I have never yet found a thankless person among the welfare workers of the world. It makes no difference what their privations or sufferings. Take for example, the case of Dr. Ussher, the hero of Van, Turkey. During the recent massacres he lost all his possessions, the accumulation of seventeen years. Then his wife died of typhus fever, and he himself nearly died of the same disease. Stripped of [illegible] property, and the dearest human friend, he is [illegible] a thankful man because he is spared to give his life for the relief of the Armenians and Syrians. You can not reduce such men to despair. They have learned, in the love of mankind, to be content no matter what their outward experience.

The trouble with a great many people lies in the superfluity of things. Ask the people in your town who are discontented to go and sit down in a row on the State House steps, or in the courthouse square, and then take note of them. It will not be a guess to say that a majority of these people have come out of the biggest houses in town. They have money. They are well dressed. They have things, but they are not content; they have too much.

IT would be a blessing to thousands of people in this country if they were compelled to live the simple life; reduced to sheer essentials; made to [illegible] through the eyes of Life. The beauty of real life, the beauty of a few things, those that really minister to soul need, is never known to the grossly rich. That is a happiness denied them; it is the penalty for [illegible] acquisition. Some day the world will learn the eternal lesson the Master taught—"A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth." The Greek word for "abundance" is really a word which means "more than enough"—a superfluity. Rendered by Weymouth's New Testament in modern speech, it reads, "Take care, be on your guard against all covetousness, for no one's life consists in the superabundance of his possessions."

What was the secret of the great apostle Paul's contentment? How could he say as he did so often, "In all things give thanks." He had found the essence of life. At the heart of it stood a [illegible] Redeemer. There was a remedy for sin, and forgiveness for sinners. There was eternal life. The resurrection played the largest part in Paul's optimism. He saw far ahead of flogging and imprisonment and shipwreck and death. No matter what happened to him—tossing on a plank in the open sea, lying half dead under the stoning of his enemies, chained to his jailer in prison, his soul sang its [illegible] song of thanksgiving. When he stood up on the deck of the wheat ship during the great gale and urged the crew to take food, he found time on the slippery floor to give thanks to God before he ate; and yet many people, and some in our churches, live such busy and self-centered lives that they do not find time to thank God for the food on the table in their homes.

THE world needs to learn the lesson of contentment and thankfulness from Paul. We need at this season of the year to learn the lesson of happiness under all circumstances. America needs to repent, to learn the value of essentials, to serve the brotherhood, so that it can say, not with the Pharisee, "I thank thee that I am not as other nations," but "I thank thee, God, that I am strong and free from war's blast, and that I am able to give food and succor to the weak and lost." And by the grace of him who gave all he had to save a lost world, I, America, will prove my thanksgiving this year, by ceasing to boast of my wealth and greatness, and by learning the secret of the great apostle, the secret of contentment, which does not depend on outward circumstances, but on the inward consciousness of a good conscience, a sense of right values, service to brother man, and the penetration of the nation's spirit into the essence of Life as it was in Christ Jesus, who never owned an acre of land and did not have where to lay his head, but who was the richest person that ever lived, because he came to give, not a superabundance of life, but the essence of life, to men."

"Thanks be unto God for his Unspeakable Gift."

Breeding in the Night

SUNDAY, December 3. Ps. 91 : 6. "The pestilence that walketh in darkness." There are deadly things which find their kingdom in the night. In the day-time they lose their sover-ıty, but they recover it again in the darkness. I w there are fatal presences which are conceived in sunshine, and they flourish and fatten in the pros-ous day. There is a "destruction that wasteth noonday." In the day's meridian this peril is at height. "'Tis the bright day that bringeth forth adder." There is an arrow that flieth by day, and ny a man is slain in the hour when there is no cloud is sky.

But when the sun has gone down, and when the mth of the twilight has faded away, and the nightds and the darkness possess our ways, other deadly ils creep out and assail our souls. And here is one ch the psalmist portrays under the figure of a tilence—"the pestilence that walketh in darkness."
ffects the spirit of man like a deadly atmosphere, the gas which steals upon the men in the trenches, the nobler powers of the soul are sunk into a fatal
p. It bears down upon us when we are down.
n the light of our joy has been blown out, and n our radiant hopes have gone out of our sky like eors which have flashed into darkness. The tilence claims us when we are depressed.

ometimes the pestilence takes the form of pessi-m, and it seems to make the soul incapable of king of the coming day. "The radiant morn has sed away!" The golden day is behind us. Life no longer any hidden uses or glory. All that is of the harvest is the thrashed and empty straw.
of which means that this sort of pestilence puts the forward-looking powers of the soul to sleep—faith, its hope, the imagination which carries ne visions, its power of prayer, its patience, its severance. They all fall asleep under the ne-ous influence of this "pestilence which walketh darkness."

nd sometimes the pestilence takes the form of icism. While pessimism throws a cloud over rything, cynicism turns everything sour. And it ins with "the milk of human kindness." The ial instincts of the soul are embittered. Its ious sympathies grow harsh and are like fine le trees which have retrograded to the crab. Life s its sweetness, its noble healthiness, its soundness emper and of spirit.

How are we to escape these pestilences which steal ut in the night? The psalmist gives us the secret.
are to "dwell in the secret place of the Most High."
en we dwell in the shadow of the Almighty, our nging circumstances do not affect our spiritual osphere. Indeed, we take our climate with us, ch is the climate of heaven; and midnight is just healthy as morning, for it is sweet with the incenseathing presence of the eternal God. J. H. J.

The Soul's Delight in Prayer

ONDAY, December 4. Job 22 : 21-30. "Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him and he shall hear
." The first condition of successful prayer is uaintance with God. We begin our religion, it been truly said, at the wrong end, concerning selves first and principally with the idea of what are or ought to be to God, without sufficiently sidering the converse of what he is to us. When know God, peace comes to us. There is that in l which necessarily gives peace to all who live on ns of intimacy with him. Since God loves us and put away our sin, we need not attempt to change feelings toward us. All that we need is to recog-what the actual state of his feelings toward us is. npared with that knowledge, all our treasures are small account. We can lay our treasure in the t and cast our gold to lie among the stones of the ok, because the Almighty has become our treasure.
t is under such conditions that prayer becomes a ght. The friend of God delights himself in the ighty, and lifts up his face unto him, as a child his face to his mother's kiss. Prayer and fellow-with God are a delight. They that know God their closest acquaintance and friend will enjoy frankest and most refreshing intercourse with . True confidence in God will make it the most ural thing in the world to put all our circum-ces, wants, and feelings into the form of prayer; such prayers from the heart that knows and loves very dear to God. He answers, and his answer net by a thank-offering.

The soul, in the strength of faith, ventures to decree things, and they are established. A new supernatural light shines on the path of life; and when all circumstances conspire to abase and lay low, the spirit is aware that God is lifting it up and making it sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. Unsealing the Book of Humanity

TUESDAY, December 5. Rev. 5 : 9. "And they sang a new song." This prophecy of humanity as being a sealed book, whose seals have been broken off by Christ, is peculiarly appropriate to meditate upon these days. The simile bears a political aspect, and it points to a day when humanity shall be one, regardless of the color of the skin or the name of the ruler. The final nationality will not be a nationality as we now think of it, but a brotherhood —a brotherhood of soul with soul.

The origin of this new order is in Christianity, and any one who has studied the leavening influence of this faith upon foreign nations must be deeply impressed by the results already manifested. Trade barriers breaking down, monarchies becoming constitutional, the spirit of equality slowly but surely arising in every nation. We hear of Federations of the Students of the World, of International Exhibitions of Industry, of World Peace Societies and World Missions of the Church—all helping to unseal the closed book of humanity and blending it in a common interest.

This opening of the universal human book is represented to have been accomplished by Christ, who established by his example and power of sacrifice a kingdom of priests. The office of the priest is to serve, and world humanity is one where serving and not ruling is the keynote. The privileges of universal service and sacrifice are to mark the final reign of God among all his people. "He that is greatest among you, let him be your servant." C. S. C.

The Sinner on His Knees

WEDNESDAY, December 6. Job 33 : 14-33. "He prayeth unto God and He is favorable unto him." Here is the picture of a man who had grievously sinned. It did not profit him, and he was fast hastening down to the pit. Of what use was it to strive against the inevitable results of his wrong-doing? He had made the vast mistake of the choice against God, and the consequences must ensue! But that is not the whole case. Suddenly illness strikes him down. He is chastened with pain upon his bed and with continual strife in his bones. His life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. He draws near to the grave and his existence to sudden dissolution. Then a messenger draws near, sent by God to interpret the meaning and intention of his afflictions and to show him what is right for him.

Beneath these gracious instructions the sinner's heart relents, and he cries, "I have sinned and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not." It is not enough to set ourselves square with righteousness, but to be in harmony with God. Hence, confession is necessary, for it is our restoration to personal union and fellowship. The barrier of the sullen heart must be broken. The poison and rancor must be expressed from the wound. The hungry, footsore, tear-stained and travel-worn prodigal must fall on the Father's bosom, crying, "I have sinned."

Then the grace of God can flow freely to heal and bless. Then an arrest is put on the descent to the pit. Then the threatened life becomes fresh as a child's and the days of youth return. Then prayer becomes again a delight. He prays unto God and sees his face with joy. Life thenceforward becomes a battle-march, a hymn of victory, a mounting sunward as on the wings of eagles. F. B. Humility and Boldness

THURSDAY, December 7. Judges 7 : 7. "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you." Gideon is a character of humility mingled with boldness. He was the immortal example of a leader who felt his own weakness, but dared to trust in God. After he had broken down the altars of Baal and cut in pieces the groves of the idol, the people flocked to Gideon's standard. But God was not to win by numbers merely, and he showed Gideon the need of reducing his forces, that men might know it was the God of Israel and not the strong armies that brought the victory.

It was a case in which humility was made a source of boldness, a vision and an outcome that cannot be accounted for save as we give God the glory. It is the lesson for these times. We trust in our own arm to bring us peace and power. We try to overcome our enemies by the 32,000. We are not humble before the limitless power of God to win through our weakness and our humility, which is but another way of saying, "We try to do it alone." Gideon would say to us, "Give Jehovah a chance to show his power!" Paul said that where he was weak, there he was strong.

The great moments of life are those in which we have experienced the strength coming down from above, working in an inexplicable manner through our weakness. It has come to us all unexpectedly at times. It has surprised us in the midst of some great sorrow or calamity, when we have thrown ourselves upon the right hand of God. It has changed our timidity into courage, it has brought an evidence of the leadership of God into our human lives.

Learning to Know God

FRIDAY, December 8. Job 1 : 1-5; 42 : 7-10. "My servant Job shall pray for you." This much-afflicted man was still God's servant—nay, more; he was God's highly approved servant. At the beginning of this book we meet the divine challenge—"Hast thou considered my servant Job? for there is none like him on the earth." And now, notwithstanding all his outcries and reproaches, God still describes him as his "servant," whose prayers and supplications are required by these men, who came to comfort but only added to his bitterness.

They were miserable comforters indeed! It was easy to pray for his children, because he loved them; but probably in the outset of the marvelous discipline through which he passed, it would have been impossible to pray for Eliphaz and his companions, supposing he could have anticipated their method of dealing with him. When, however, a man has seen God, his whole attitude to his companions and the world is affected. He is able, in the light of his new experiences, to love his enemies and pray for those who have despitefully used him. His soul attains a new stature and can effect the hitherto impossible.

When a man comes to know God, he is humbled in dust and ashes, and accounts himself least of saints and chief of sinners. Then he ceases to wonder at the harsh words that have been addressed to him by his critics. He says, "If they only knew me, as I now know myself, they would make much severer charges than I have heard or seen." We may not have reached this state as yet, but we can at least watch over and bless our children and friends, praying for them most in their days of fasting and merry-making, lest they should have indulged in any license of thought or speech that might leave a stain. We are called, as priests unto God, to a life of intercession; let us use our privilege of access. F. B. M.

Our God Is Ready to Forgive

SATURDAY, December 9. I John 2 : 12. "Your sins are forgiven you for his Name's sake." When Queen Victoria had been crowned, as she was leaving the grand pageant of the coronation the Duke of Wellington asked for her signature to a document which condemned a certain soldier to death. The young queen said, "Must I do this? Can nothing be done to save this man?" "No," replied the duke; "the man is found guilty of an aggravated offense." Victoria looked up into his face and, with tears brighter than the jewels in her crown, said: "For my sake, duke, will you not give this man another trial?" The duke promised and retired. In a few days he returned with a pardon for the criminal. Further investigation had proved the man not guilty. For the sake of the queen's tears and her great name, the nation had been saved from the stain of blood-guiltiness and an innocent man from death.

Our King on his throne of grace pleads not for another trial, but that the guilty may be pardoned and that He, in his own blood, may make them white and free. For his Name's sake the high court of heaven applauds the act of boundless mercy and redeeming grace.

If you will not come to God for your own sake or that of your loved ones, come for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. His infinite mercy should melt the hardest heart and bring all lost ones to pardon, peace and salvation through him. E. W. C.

Five More Prohibition States

AT the late election five more states passed into the Prohibition column, viz.: Michigan, Nebraska, Montana, South Dakota and Idaho. Utah elected a legislature pledged to pass a statutory prohibition law during the coming session. Idaho, which has a statutory prohibitory law, wrote prohibition into its constitution by a majority of three to one. At one stroke in Michigan the shackles of rum were broken from about three million people, and Detroit, with its 450,000 inhabitants, became the largest "dry" city of the western hemisphere. These five states, added to the nineteen already "dry," make twenty-four, or one-half of all the states in the Union, so that at the present time sixty per cent. of the population and eighty per cent. of the territory of the United States is under prohibitory law.

Then, too, the victory in Alaska for "no license" was amazing. Prohibition was virtually at stake in five other states: Washington, Iowa, Colorado, Arizona and Arkansas, where the liquor people attempted to secure the adoption of proposals which would have nullified their prohibitory laws. All of these attempts were defeated at the polls. In California and Missouri the anti-saloon people were defeated. In Maryland, the city of Baltimore and some other places rejected prohibition; but three counties and one city went "dry." Into the geographical area of the new dry states could be set down all of New England, all of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware, and the space would be only a little more than one-third occupied. The area in four states made "dry" in a day could be set down over Great Britain, Italy, Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, and European Turkey, and there would be 18,000 square miles left over.

It was a great triumph which was won for a "sober nation." It marked the most signal temperance victory in the history of the country. The putting of 5,000,000 people in one day under prohibition, and the closing of between five and ten thousand liquor establishments by the fiat of the ballot box, demonstrate the ability of the people to right their own wrongs and to abolish their own evils.

Party had nothing to do with the issue. The nonpartisan victory is seen in the fact that two of the four states, Montana and Nebraska, went for Wilson, the other two, South Dakota and Michigan, for Hughes. The resolution for nation-wide prohibition pending in Congress will be pushed at this winter's session. A two-thirds' vote is necessary to carry it. Only twelve more "dry states" will make up the thirty-six—the three-fourths necessary to ratify the resolution and wipe out the saloon in America forever. Bills will be introduced to remove the liquor traffic from the District of Columbia and to prevent the carrying of liquor advertisements through the mail. At the present speed of this moral revolution, it is reasonable to hope that the saloon will be abolished by Federal legislation within ten years, possibly in five.

The victory for prohibition vindicates the virility of the church. "Big business," science, self-interest, are all shown by the reports from the states already "dry" to have been factors in the contest; but it was the devoted, earnest women of America and an almost united church, under the direction of God's Spirit, that won the victory.

Good Out of Evil

TWO notable voices speaking for peace have come to us across the Atlantic recently. They are the voices of men who are somewhat more than titled statesmen—Albert Apponyi and James Bryce are easily among the leading minds of Europe. Both are men of broad vision, with ideals that lift them far above the ordinary level of the average statesman, and both are eminently capable of taking a world view of the outlook in Europe.

It is a coincidence that these two distinguished men, one speaking in London, the other in Berlin during the same week, should have chosen peace as their topic. Neither, however, entertains hopes that it will come soon. The Hungarian statesman looks forward to a time, not very far distant, when, certain objects having been attained, the futility of prolonging the war will be recognized by all sides, and our government may be acceptable as an intermediary. Lord Bryce takes a similar view. That both are in a position to gauge the opinion of Europe may be regarded as a reasonable conclusion. There was, however, in the mind of Lord Bryce a thought which reached beyond the immediate prospect. It was his hope and belief, he said, that when the struggle was over and past, we should see not only a new Europe but a new world!

This is the hope which is in many minds at the present time and which rises above all others. During these twenty-seven terrible months, the hope has been steadily growing that the world might emerge from the struggle better and wiser and more kindly human than ever before. It would almost seem as though the Omnipotent had permitted this war, which the nations had brought upon themselves, in order that through so much death and suffering men might be satiated with strife and have done with war forever.

This is the new world for which not only ex-Ambassador Bryce but God's people everywhere hope and pray and look. Not like the world we have known, with its divisive and conflicting interests, its antagonisms founded upon misunderstanding and misconceptions and rooted in selfishness; but a world in which all men will know each other better than they have ever done in the past; in which the fire will have burned out from the hearts of the nations the old rancor and the bitter hatreds, leaving only the pure spirit of friendship and kindly goodwill.

From all points of view, therefore, the world may yet profit by its experience. Out of this immeasurable evil the greatest good may come. It is a time for peace-lovers to take courage and to look forward to the opportunity which awaits us in rendering practical aid to the efforts that will, as Professor Bryce assures us, be made "to secure for mankind the great blessing of an enduring peace."

A Ray of Sunshine

IT was a gray morning, a very gray morning, one of those mornings when the clouds hang low and when a driving mist that is almost a fog shows scant respect for umbrellas, when pavements are slippery with clinging moisture, and people and horses walk carefully, and folks at least reflect the somber motive of the day. The editor was walking toward the office, rather enjoying the brush of the mist against his face, but just a bit depressed by the heaviness of the atmosphere, when he saw coming toward him a diminutive daughter of Italy. She walked briskly. Her plaid dress was bright even in the half-light of that misty morning. Her hair was drawn smoothly back from her forehead and gathered in two short, tight pigtails, which projected upward and backward from her crown and caught and echoed each vibration of her springing walk. Her brown eyes glistened and a fugitive dimple in each cheek seemed waiting only an excuse to reveal itself. She was happiness incarnate, and the editor smiled inwardly as he sensed the full measure of her cheer. Involuntarily he smiled outwardly too; not a wide smile, but the sort that lingers in the eye or flickers in the corner of the mouth; but it was enough. The dimples on the bright little face began a game of hide and seek, the eyes twinkled, even the pigtails seemed to feel a subtle joy and to vibrate more vigorously, and two rows of white teeth flashed through the parted lips that smiled a smile so wide that it was almost a laugh. Then the editor laughed outright, and the child of sunny Italy laughed, too, and there was a spot of sunshine on that fog-bound pavement and a spot of brightness in the editor's heart that persisted throughout the day, even after the fog had lifted and the mist had ceased to drift.

Professor Lowell and Mars

IN a brilliant galaxy of American astronomers, which includes such distinguished names as Proctor, Swift, Leland, Draper and others, the name of Percival Lowell stands out with especial prominence. Professor Lowell, who died on November 13 in his observatory at Flagstaff, Arizona, may not have been a great astronomer, but he was certainly one who invested his theme with interest, with the result that he was perhaps better known to people than most of his contemporaries. His fame rests chiefly on the extraordinary researches he conducted in relation to the planet Mars, and his assertion that it was the abode of living intelligent beings. He discovered what he declared to be the handiwork of a race endowed with reasoning and constructive qualities so like those found in our own world that they could hardly be other than human beings. All the primary requisites for the support of animal life he found on the planet—water, heat and atmosphere. His discovery of a vast network of not less than five hundred canals—some of them nearly a thousand miles in length—constructed, as he declared, with greater intelligence and engineering skill and on a far grander scale than anything we possess or can show, stimulated the desire of the scientific as as the unlearned to know more about the wonc world which seemed to be opening a new portal might lead to the revelation of the secrets of the verse. Professor Schiaparelli had found only canals with the telescope, yet his observations accepted as strengthening the theories advance Lowell. So, little by little, the world has con believe that the red planet is really inhabited

Upon this slender basis has been constructe most romantic theories concerning the Mar They have been the subject of play and novel. have been credited with extraordinary mecha ingenuity and almost incredible scientific attain Their canals, which Lowell believed to be gig reservoirs or irrigation ditches, devised to hus a water supply which was continually dimini have been regarded by some astronomers as na phenomena incidental to the influence of the cha seasons on vegetation. Although there were scientists who seriously endorsed all of Lo conclusions, his bold and not illogical conje proved fascinating and popular. ·1917 FEATURES·

T is a new world in which we are now living, if we contrast it with the world with which we were so familiar only a few years ago. Tremendous changes, national and international, the introduction of new and potial forces undreamed of before, the great stimulation inventive industries, the appalling tragedy of the war, wreck of cities and the devastation of a continent—se have changed the world, and almost all the things it formerly absorbed human attention have given place others. In this era of universal change, the Christian rald has found its field of vision tremendously enlarged, and the scope of its activities has become more than ever world-wide.

The great need of our time is real religion. The repentant nations are on their knees before God. The world is coming back to Christ. It is our task to help energize this general return to righteousness, this new recognition of the divine rulership, this rehabilitation of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world. To do all that lies within us toward realizing these aims, we have prepared a religious program for the Christian Herald for 1917 on a more comprehensive scale than at any period of its previous history.

"The Road to Understanding"

gives us great pleasure to announce that we have secured for serial publication in the Christian Herald a new story by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, whose famous story, "Pollyanna," was first published in the Christian ld. Competent critics who have read the manuscript are the new story to be as good if not better than "Polly-n." The publishers of the story in book form have such dence in its coming success that they are arranging to a first edition of one hundred thousand copies.

e first instalment of this remarkable story will be ed in the Christian Herald early during the coming year. ill be preceded by another serial story telling is is the story of the strenuous efforts of Janice to stamp he drink evil from her beloved small town. The above es will be printed in book form at $1.35 and $1.25 each. subscribers for the Christian Herald will be able to read without one cent of extra expense. Either one of them ne worth the subscription price; and either would make Christian Herald a most acceptable holiday gift.

Future of Church

URING the past year the great question, "Is Christianity a failure?" has been sharply discussed throughout the religious world. Assaults have been made on the Church from without and within, and rible indictment of inefficiency has been leveled against it. Is this right and justifiable, or is it wrong? Has the Church lost its power to win men to Christ? To what extent is it responsible for the pean collapse? What must it do to save its own soul? e and other kindred questions will be discussed in a of powerful articles by the Rev. Mercer G. Johnston, of the strongest authorities on the subject, who writes a trenchant pen and with a compelling interest for the r.

Reforma- Jubilee

NETEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTEEN is the four hundredth anniversary of the Reformation. stant America is arranging for a great Jubilee Celebration. All the denominations are interested in it. Special articles, dealing with the leading phases of the Reformation and the influence of er's life and work on America and the world, will be ibuted by able writers, including Pastor D. H. ens, Professor W. H. T. Dau, Pastor H. P. Eckhardt, or E. H. Pannkoke, and others, who are making a special of the subject.

ough the nt

R readers already know of the journeyings of that right American writer, Maynard Owen Williams, e Far East. His entertaining descriptions of Japan, China and Korea will be a continuing feature of prime interest in these pages during 1917. Mr. Williams is doing much to give us the right perive on Oriental life and character, besides showing are the true relations and sentiments of the people of East toward ourselves. Next to making a trip to China Japan, you cannot do better than read every one of splendid, well-illustrated articles.

Sermonic artment

R Sermonic Department will give the Gospel message a stronger and more confident note than ever e. Among the regular contributors will be Rev. J. H. Jowett, who besides contributing the first sermon of each month will also lead in the Meditations. Other contributors will be Rev. C. H. Park-, Rev. David J. Burrell, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, or D. H. Steffens, Pastor H. P. Eckhardt, Rev. C. A. n and Dr. F. B. Meyer.

Mountain Peaks of Prophecy

ONE of the leading authorities on Prophecy today is Professor James M. Gray, dean of Moody Institute of Chicago, already well known to our readers, who has promised to contribute four comprehensive and wonderfully enlightening articles on "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," which every one who loves to look forward to the time of the world's redemption will read with intense interest.

Archeology

THOUSANDS of our readers have read with delight the illuminative contributions of such eminent authorities in Oriental research and its relation to Bible history as Professor Albert T. Clay, Babylonian Department of Yale University; Professor Langdon, University of Pennsylvania, and Professor Edgar J. Banks. These foremost American travelers and archeologists will contribute, during the coming year, articles on the latest phases of Oriental research, which will be both valuable and instructive.

Famous Men and Women

FAMOUS men and women, who stand high in the literary and sociological world, will be among our contributors for 1917: Florence Morse Kingsley, author of "Titus" and "Stephen"; Josephine A. Dodge and Carrie C. Catt, representing the opposing wings of Woman Suffrage; Lucy Rider Meyer, the charming writer on philanthropy and sociology; Amelia E. Barr, whose stories are read everywhere; Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of Christian Endeavor, and globe-trotter; Charles Stelzle, field secretary, sociologist and long active in Christian and humanitarian work; Frank Carpenter, traveler, author and lecturer; Hedgar Pluviannes, whose little tragedies on the Great War have enthralled our readers; Professor David Smith, the famous authority on Bible interpretation, and many others.

Christian Experiences

THE series will continue during a large part of the coming year, and will tell of the personal struggles and triumphs of many who have found the way of salvation.

New Sacred Songs

DURING the coming year the Christian Herald will publish a number of new hymns with music. These compositions are the productions of some of the leading composers of the day—men who have made a name in the field of sacred music. The power of Gospel song to win souls is almost unequaled. These beautiful songs, some of them solos with chorus, others four-part songs, etc., are suited for choir work or for the home-gathering or for other occasions.

Are We Nearing the End of the Age?

STUDENTS of the Bible and those who are watchful of the signs of the times are everywhere discussing the question whether the world is not approaching what has been termed "The End of the Age." There are multiplying indications of a great and world-wide change, which many believe to be due after the present tremendous struggle is over—a change which may suddenly reveal itself as the fulfilment of some long-discussed prophecy. What will be the condition of society in the event of a new age being ushered in? Will it be millennial? Will it witness the restoration of the Chosen Race to Palestine? Will it be the end of war and the beginning of the thousand years of peace?

> Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
> Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
> Ring out the thousand wars of old,
> Ring in the thousand years of peace.

The ablest minds will discuss this alluring topic during the coming year, in the pages of the Christian Herald.

The Church and Present-Day Problems

HOW far should the Church go in taking an attitude of activity toward the solution of social, economic, moral, and industrial problems? How far is it justified in using its influence, and the means at its disposal, in bringing about better conditions for the neglected millions, in addition to giving them the Gospel? Can it successfully carry the doctrines taught by Jesus into all the affairs of everyday life, without interference with the functions of the State? There are many important ramifications to this subject, which will be discussed during the coming year.

The Church and Socialism

IT is a most significant fact that, at the recent Protestant Episcopal General Convention, some thirteen of the new bishops were found on the side of Socialism. Christian Socialism is making its headway in many of the denominations. The question is asked, "Was Jesus Christ a Socialist?" in the sense that his teachings are of a character which many Socialists acknowledge as the basis of their economic creed; justice to labor, universal helpfulness, the dangers of increasing wealth, the rights of the poor, man's duty toward God and man, etc. These are among the vital topics of our day, and they will receive attention during the coming year.

Religious Progress During 1917

MORE than in any previous year in its history, the Christian Herald proposes to keep in statistical touch with all of the Christian denominations for the purpose of showing, from time to time, their spiritual progress and the growth of true religion throughout the country. All of the information published will be gathered from the official leaders of the various denominations, and will be found reliable and authentic, and of interest to every reader.

The World's "Biggest Business"

IT is now generally admitted that there is no business on earth which can compare in magnitude, in the material means employed, or in astonishing, world-wide development, with the business of Christian Missions. It has been stated that it is bigger than the next half-dozen businesses rolled into one, both as to the numbers engaged and the capital invested. No one can claim the name of Christian or assume to be living up to his privileges, unless he has a share in the carrying out of the Great Commission. The growth of the "King's Business" will receive attention in these columns during 1917.

The Church with a Problem

THE church with a problem today is the out-of-town church. In thousands of villages the local churches find themselves losing in influence and in support. New attractions for the young people have sprung up that strongly compete with the church. From many quarters the complaint comes that the fires of evangelism and service are dying out. That such conditions need not exist in any town where there is a live church is proven over and over again in hundreds of places. It shall be our endeavor to show how this very real problem is being not only solved, but destroyed as a problem, in all parts of our countryside.

Making Your Church Known

THE plain fact is being recognized that churches cannot rely upon their silent influence to draw people within their doors. With the greatest work in the world to perform, churches nevertheless find that they must adapt themselves to methods of today if they would do that work effectively. The real difficulty is in drawing a line between unsuitable methods of church advertising and methods that are both eminently in keeping with the high character of the church's mission and effective in interesting the public at large. How to fill your church with people and how to fill the people with your church, are topics of first importance, and will be treated by men who have succeeded.

A BOOK WITH A MESSAGE FOR EVERY SOUL

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands of every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish absolute evidence o the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to his followers: "Whatso-ever ye shall ask of the Father in my name He will give it you." "Ask and it shall be given you. . . ."

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happenin in our own time—now—of prayers answered for

- Healing from sickness
- For averting blindness
- For absent friends
- For wayward sons' conversions
- For spiritual progress
- For aid in business troubles
- Relief from drug habit
- Cure of drunkenness
- For conversion of friends
- For revivals
- For mental troubles
- Lifting of burdens and a host of other requests, all of which are presented in the name of Jesus and submitted to the Divine Will. There is hardly a conceivable situatio in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35;
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers, as a reward, for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

JUST DAVID
ELEANOR H PORTER
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of Pollyanna - Miss Billy - The Story of Marco - The Turn of the Tide - Cross Currents - etc.

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES

WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

Here are some of the difficult questions that are thoroughly dealt with in this new book:

Does God employ evil spirits?

What should be the Christian attitude on dancing?

Is the Bible opposed to woman suffrage?

Is it wrong for Christian people to read fiction?

Can a Christian conscientiously play cards?

Will the future state be one of material or spiritual glory?

Does a suicide lose his inheritance in heaven?

What should be the Christian's attitude on war?

What is fellowship with God?

Who was Pilate's wife?

Do angels visit people now?

What is "worldly dress"?

What church entertainments are permissible, and what otherwise; fairs, suppers, etc.?

What does the Bible tell us of the Second Coming?

What is the soul?

If God is omnipotent, why does he let sin go on?

Does God permit evil that good may result?

428 other equally important questions.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Martin Luther Anniversary Book

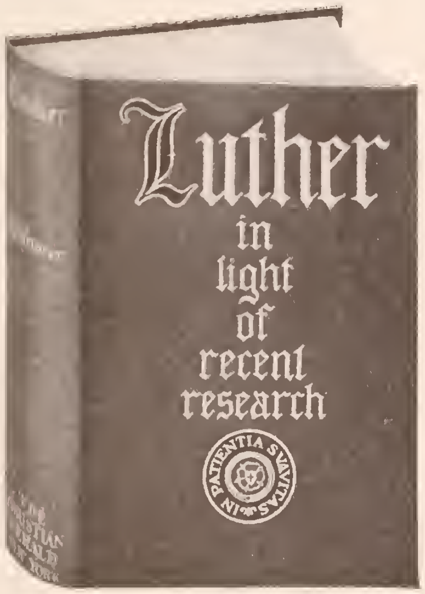
"Luther in Light of Recent Research"

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has had the work translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book, which should be read by every Protestant in America, is supplemented by a series of eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

We will send the "Life of Luther," handsomoly bound in cloth, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.75.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.



Two Books by a Famous Pastor

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D.

DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein, and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands, as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarefied atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture. He drinks deep draughts at the springs of faith, warms himself in the sunlight of hope, and finds cheer and comfort, consolation and strength to go forward.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50.
Or, we will send a copy of each volume to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

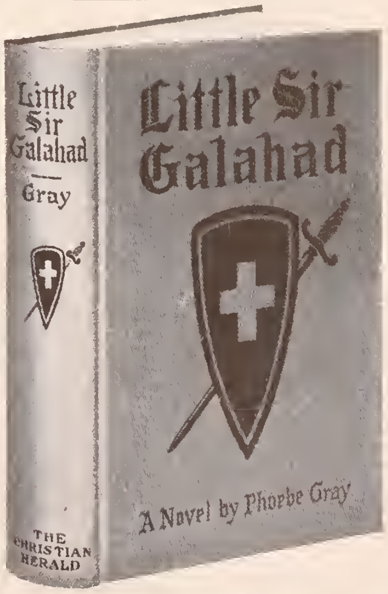
40,000 Beautiful Quotations

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. It was a remarkable compilation, and it was used largely in public as well as private libraries.

In the course of time, the edition of this book became exhausted. We had so many inquiries for the work that we have republished it, thoroughly revised.

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of today, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to accomplish that result.

We will send "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.



A Story for the Family Circle

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD is a boy every bit as wonderful and with as high ideals as those of the ancient Knights, but he is an up-to-date hero and a very real little personage, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and, together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence, he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story.

"Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Lem Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate. There is much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story.

We will send "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.
Or, we will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

SPECIAL SALE of GOOD BOOKS

THE Christian Herald has established a regular bookselling department through which all members of the Christian Herald Family may obtain any reputable book issued by any publisher at the lowest ssible price at which it may be sold. We believe that r readers will appreciate the advantages of a book-selling partment.

There are many books put upon the market today which would not feel justified in recommending, but on the ner hand there are so many books which we think should brought to the attention of our readers that we have cided to open this department for their special use. No tter what book you want, let us know about it and we ll try to procure it for you. Or if you merely desire inmation about any book, write us and we will look it up you.

There is need of a book censorship of the kind contemplated in the Christian Herald Book Department. There is also a probability of our being able to obtain better prices in many cases than a single purchaser could obtain far away from the book-store.

The books which follow on this page and the next have been procured at far below the regular price, and we are giving our readers the benefit of that reduction. You will note that the publisher's price and our price are indicated in each case. Nearly all of the volumes have been written by standard authors, and should be on the book-shelves of every Christian home. They will make splendid Christmas presents.

Buy your books of the Christian Herald. No matter what book you want (if it is a reputable book), we can supply it—it makes no difference who publishes it.

HE following religious books are offered at prices much below those at which they were published. Some genuine bargains will be found among them. They will appeal cially to clergymen and church workers.

If God Be For Us

By JOHN A. HUTTON, M.A.

Studies in the beliefs, protests, fears and ideas which lie behind that passionate and militant passage which occurs at the close of the eighth chapter of St. Paul's letter to the Romans.

As we yield ourselves up to the emotion of these words—words in which the final things in a man's soul betray themselves—we arrive at a spirit-promontory from which we can quietly review the world's real worth. 12mo. Cloth.

ISAIAH 61 The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-and his meat was locusts and wild [i] honey.

5 ¶ Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6 And [j] were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.

7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from [k] the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for [1] repentance:

9 And think not to say within yourselves, [l] We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: [m] therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

11 I [n] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: [o] he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly [p] purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will [q] burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus [r] from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to [s] fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And [t] Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the [u] Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

17 And [v] lo a voice from heaven, saying, [w] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

days and forty nights, he was afterward a hungered.

3 And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.

4 But he answered and said, It is written, [f] Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

5 Then the devil taketh him up into the [g] holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple,

6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, [h] He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

7 Jesus said unto him, It is written again, [i] Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

8 Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them;

9 And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.

10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou [j] shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.

11 Then the devil [k] leaveth him, and, behold, [l] angels came and ministered unto him.

12 ¶ Now [m] when Jesus had heard that John was [1] cast into prison, he departed into Galilee;

13 And leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim:

14 That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying,

15 The [n] land of Zabulon, and the land of Nephthalim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles;

16 The [o] people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up.

17 From [p] that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, [q] Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLES AND TESTAMENTS

Our Red Letter Bible—Only Genuine Edition

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Yale's Two Hundredth Anniversary

THE recent two hundredth anniversary of Yale College was celebrated in a manner becoming so important an event. The exercises reached their climax in the superb pageants presented in the Bowl, the mammoth athletic arena of the university. There were seven thousand performers, and twenty-five thousand spectators. The scenes represented the early history of the New Haven colony, the life of the Yale student from the beginning till now, and other matters. Elihu Yale, born in Boston, went to India, amassed a large fortune, and made gifts of books and money to the Collegiate School of Connecticut at Saybrook, which had been founded in 1701. When the school was removed to New Haven in 1717 it was named Yale College after its benefactor To the school, which already had a medical course, were added a theological school in 1822, and a law school in 1824, and a scientific course in 1846. Since then schools of philosophy and fine arts and post-graduate courses of all kinds have been added. In 1871 the college officially took the name of Yale University, though it had been in fact a university almost from the beginning. The first trustees who governed Yale were ten of the most prominent ministers of the colony. Yale, like most of the universities of America and of the world, was founded by followers of Christ, and through its long life has breathed a healthful moral and religious atmosphere. The devout children of Yale recognize the divine providence in the foundation and prosperity of their alma mater, and may say with Samuel, when he "took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." (I Sam. 7 : 12.)

War Makes Men Gray

ARMY physicians and men of science are discussing the effect on future generations of the premature aging of millions of n now at the battle fronts. It is said t soldiers ten months in the trenches, osed to the nerve-shattering shock shell fire, often come out with the earance of ten years having been ed to their life. A shorter period n this often suffices to turn to iron-y the hair of a boy of twenty-five. s premature aging is peculiar to no ionality. It is noticeable alike along English and French lines and among prisoners from Germany, Austria Russia. "We attribute the gray s now so noticeable everywhere at front to a 'subconscious worry'," l a Canadian army surgeon. He tinued: "I have never known actu- of hair turning gray over night, the novelists are so fond of putting but it often happens within the space week or ten days." There is no wpoint from which the war does not k terrible. The premature aging of survivors is pathetic; but what of millions of young men, the flower of rope, who went out never to return? thought of it is enough to break the rt of the race. The effect of the it upon the body, of the agony of soul on the physical health, is a ntific fact. The effect of sorrow for afflicted nation upon his appearance hown in the cup-bearer who offered wine to Artaxerxes the king, who, icing his changed appearance, said: hy is thy countenance sad, seeing thou not sick? This is nothing else but ow of heart." (Neh. 2 : 2.)

ill Requires Cooking, Sewing

WEALTHY woman left $10,000 to each one of her two granddaughters the condition that at the age of nty-one she should have learned to k well a meal with six courses and to ke a suit of clothes which she should r. The two young ladies are children vealth and culture, college girls. The er day one of the granddaughters ched the age of twenty-one, and she l long before demonstrated to com- ent judges her ability to cook a meal six courses to the queen's taste, and nake with her own hands every stitch lothing she had on, which fitted her utifully. The other granddaughter also proven herself an expert in king and sewing, and is ready for the thday and the $10,000. What a sen- le old woman this grandmother was! knew that while the girls would be ght Latin, Greek, French, botany, ronomy, chemistry, history, poetry, sic, and painting, all necessary in a eral education, there was something even more elemental and important: the preparing of food for the support of the body and clothing for its protection and adornment. She knew that the ceaseless round of fashionable life, which lays such a cruel tribute on the time, energy, and health of the young women of today, would lure them away from usefulness and happiness, and she wanted to emphasize the necessity of the homemakers' instinct and mission. A girl who grows into her majority without knowing how to sweep, make a bed, cook a meal, darn a stocking, or make a suit of clothes for a boy or girl, will be a handicap to the man who marries her, and a greater handicap to herself. The daughters of nearly all the multimillionaires in this country are taught the art of housekeeping as a necessary condition of the greatest usefulness and happiness. Fortunately domestic science is being introduced into public and private schools and female colleges, and the most competent and highly paid instructors are teaching the girls how to cook and sew. There is this mention of the ideal housekeeper who made her own clothing: "She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff." (Prov. 31 : 19.)

British Columbia's Telescope

AN immense steel framework is being completed at the new Dominion Observatory at Saneteh Hill, British Columbia, to house the second largest telescope in the world. The instrument has a lens measurement of 73 inches, and its tube is sufficiently large for an automobile to drive through it. In few departments of science has there been greater progress than in astronomy. Millions of the ancients worshiped the stars, but they knew almost nothing about them. In these days men give names to the stars, calculate their velocity, take their measure and weight. With the aid of powerful telescopes there are revealed systems beyond systems of worlds. And the devout student of science, with the Bible as the telescope, with the eye of faith sees these systems of worlds all revolving around God's white throne. The psalmist caught somewhat of the magnitude and sublimity of the starry heavens as the divine handiwork when he said: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained, what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. 8 : 3, 4.)

School Teacher Fifty Years

WILLIAM WATTS, supervising principal of the schools of Burlington, N. J., was the guest of honor the other night at a dinner to celebrate his fifty years of service, given by the "old boys" he had taught during the half century. More than 300 attended the reception and dinner, which was served in the Baptist Society Hall. The municipality of Burlington presented to Mr. Watts an engrossed set of resolutions, and the "old boys" gave him a gold watch, which was presented by W. E. Schermerhorn. Among those who spoke at the dinner were H. S. Prickett of Philadelphia, G. E. Armstrong of Chicago, C. J. Webb of Philadelphia, Rev. J. E. Shaw of Perth Amboy, A. Fraser of Cleveland, G. G. Dunn of Burlington, S. D. Lansing of Watertown, N. Y., and R. Frothingham of New York. How befitting the dinner given by the city and the "old boys" in recognition of fifty years of service, whose influence no earthly scale can weigh or arithmetic compute! Let not all the laurel be bestowed upon the warrior, the ruler, the money prince, the baseball champion. Let the wreath be put on the brow of the school teacher, the real ruler in the realm of mind; on the brow of him who with patience and fidelity prepared the young for the practical duties of this life and for the destiny of the life which is to come. In character and service he was a minister of the Lord Jesus. The apostle, in enumerating those who were to have an important part in saving the world, said: "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." (Eph. 4 : 11.)

Oak and Olive Trees

A CERTAIN blight has been noticed on the olive trees of various parts of the world. The blight has been traced to the proximity of the oak to the olive tree. By special scientific investigation of the subject in Italy it has been discovered that no disease is transmitted by the oak, but that the roots of the oak appropriate the richness of the soil and literally starve the olive into its diseased condition. The olive was one of the most important articles of food among the Hebrews. It is constantly mentioned in the Scriptures. The diseased olive trees of today call to mind this verse: "The labor of the olive shall fail." (Hab. 3 : 17.)

Sells Teeth for Whisky

A MAN appeared in the court of Judge Mahoney in Chicago the other day on the charge of having had his teeth pulled out, taking out the heavy gold fillings from them and selling them for whisky, and then refusing to pay the dentist for pulling his teeth. Policeman and dentist appeared against him and he was sent to the House of Correction. Poor fellow! His thirst for rum was so hot, and so crazy was he made by it, that he did this ridiculous and wicked thing. Such wrecks of body and mind are the very things, however, that are helping to kill the liquor traffic. The incident is an illustration of the fact that "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging." (Prov. 20 : 1.)

Making Bread with Potatoes

THE Agricultural Department at Washington has been making a series of experiments in the utilizing of potatoes in the making of bread. The experts there declare that bread containing boiled and mashed potatoes is just as nutritious as that made of wheat alone, and that it has the advantage of remaining fresh longer. The government experts baked excellent bread with three pounds of potatoes and two and a half pounds of wheat flour. Three recipes have been formulated. Bread made of cereals has been counted as the staff of life through all the centuries. The wheat of Egypt is thus used as a synonym for bread: "And the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread." (Gen. 41 : 54.) in world history for the children of our posterity to study in their schools!

What a chapter awaits the writing, for them to study alongside of that one! A chapter that will recount the triumph of Christian charity over the lust of gain. A chapter that you who read these lines will help to write. A chapter that is not drenched with the blood of fighting armies, but with the grateful tears of rescued peoples. A chapter that will not recount the splendid conquests of mad hosts, but an overcoming of famine and pestilence by the simple gifts of gentle hearts. A chapter that will not stagger the mind with the records of the casualties in a great war, but will strengthen the human race in the quality of mercy by records of countless families reunited, reinstated in their homes, remade into nations. A chapter that will have nothing to tell of vast indemnities exacted by conquering hordes, but much to tell of mighty gifts by myriad hands that gave and gave again and kept on giving until every hunger pang had ceased and every tear had dried.

THE good ship Cæsar is but one, and in comparison, indeed, a slight, incident in the great work of mercy which is to be done. But it is an incident in which all of us should be glad to have whatever part we have taken. As at present planned, the ship will carry 1,000 cases of condensed milk (for children); 200,000 pounds of lima beans; 2,100,000 pounds of whole wheat; 50,000 gallons of petroleum; 500,000 pounds of sugar; 600,000 pounds of rice; 400,000 pounds of crushed wheat; 10,000 barrels of flour; 25,000 gallons of cottonseed oil. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief is still calling for funds with which to pay for the supplies and if possible increase the quantity. These things are the best possible commodities to be sent into that land. They will do the maximum of good at the minimum of cost. In other words, they constitute the most economical and beneficial cargo that could be selected.

When the vessel arrives at Beirut, the cargo will be turned over to Dr. Ward, chairman of the Red Cross Committee, who will take charge of the distribution, cooperating with the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief and with missionaries. Mr. W. W. Peet, treasurer of the American Board at Constantinople, assures the committee that every particle of merchandise will positively reach those for whom it is intended. The ship is scheduled to sail from New York early in December, and while it may not reach its destination in time for Christmas distribution, this initial gift of food supplies will nevertheless go as a Christmas gift. And it is by no means too late for the readers of the Christian Herald to enlarge their share in this cargo. Gifts intended specifically for that purpose should be forwarded immediately to us, and be so designated.

NO Thanksgiving Day family reunion could better express gratitude to God for the blessings of the year than in the form of a definite determination to give, for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe during the ensuing twelve months, as large an amount and as regularly as possible. The monthly offering clubs which we have instituted will be found by our readers to be a great help in systematic giving and distribution of gifts of charity which cannot be administered directly by the givers. In fact, we suggest that every reader of the Christian Herald signalize this Thanksgiving Day by adopting this systematic giving plan. It would be a simple matter to look ahead for the year and lay out, tentatively at any rate, the distribution of your charitable gifts. Plans so made must to a certain extent be somewhat elastic, as for one reason or another it may be desirable either to increase your outlay or to retrench at some time during the year. But the amount that you will put aside weekly for charitable gifts you can decide upon, and how it shall be divided. And we shall be very glad to have you make use of the Monthly Offering Clubs plan of the Christian Herald for the prompt and effective distribution of any proportion of your charities. We will enter you under any one of the clubs that you designate, and each monthly remittance (or weekly, if you prefer to send it in so often) will be entered to your credit and distributed exactly as you specify. The clubs are not designed solely for the war relief work, but for general benevolences. Let us tell you again what these clubs are:

No. 1. For donors of fifty cents monthly.
No. 2. For donors of one dollar monthly.
No. 3. For donors of two dollars monthly.

BUT do not let us draw your attent n away from the main purpose f this article by this reference to meth . While America is celebrating Than - giving Day with praise for overwhelm g blessings of prosperity and freedom fr pestilence and calamity, these ab t whom we have been writing are in e very depths of sorrow and sufferi . experiments. Carranza troops are reported to have retaken Parral and Jimenez from the Villistas. On the other hand, it was reported that the forces of Felix Diaz had captured Tehuantepec City and to have invested Salina Cruz.

Crushing Pressure on China. Correspondence of the Associated Press from Peking shows great uneasiness in the Chinese capital and press over the continued political pressure of Japan, which is reported as even more relentless since the Chengchiatung incident, reported in the Christian Herald of September 6 and 20, in which Japanese and Chinese troops clashed over the arrest of Japanese merchants in Manchuria. Japan is reported to be demanding the reprimand of the Chinese division commander, punishment of the officers directly responsible, the issuance of orders to Chinese troops in southern Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia forbidding them to irritate or provoke Japanese troops or residents, and the stationing of Japanese police at such points in the two provinces as the Japanese government may consider necessary. In addition to these demands, Japan is suggesting but not insisting at present upon the employment of a certain number of Japanese officers as military advisers of Chinese troops and the employment of Japanese officers as instructors in the Chinese military academy, upon an apology of the Chinese military governor of Mukden, and the provision of a suitable sum of money as indemnity to Japanese and the families of Japanese injured or killed in the Chengchiatung affair. The Peking Gazette is quoted as saying, "It is not friendship that Japan seeks in China; it is loot and plunder that she hunts for." The $5,000,000 loan which China has been seeking for over a year was arranged with the Continental and Commercial National Bank of Chicago on November 16. The terms of the agreement were approved by the American State Department.

Washington Protests Belgian Exile. It was reported on November 14 that the good offices of the United States government were being exerted in an effort to bring a halt to the deportation of Belgian civilians into Germany for forced labor. No formal protest was made. Mr. Joseph C. Grew, American chargé d'affaires at Berlin, was cabled to take the matter up personally with Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg and to point out to him that the forcible removal of Belgians into Germany was making a most unfavorable impression upon neutral public opinion.

A Union of Employers. There was organized in New York on November 15 an organization of employers which will be known as the National Industrial Conference Board. This organization will prepare the industries of the United States for the economic changes that are to follow peace in Europe. It will be a clearing-house for economic information and a forum for constructive discussion, and will furnish machinery for cooperative action. The Board represents twelve industrial organizations comprising 15,000 employers, who direct the energies of 7,000,000 workers. In some quarters the organization is looked upon as a union of employers, which might be expected to combat organized labor in its efforts to secure legislation such as the recently passed Adamson eight-hour law.

Deutschland in Collision. The submarine merchantman Deutschland on November 17 rammed and sank the tug T. A. Scott, Jr., which was convoying the Deutschland to sea. The tug was ahead of the Deutschland, and was temporarily halted by the tide in a passage called The Race at the entrance to the Thames River. Before either the tug or the Deutschland could maneuver, the freighter struck the tug which went to the bottom with all five of its crew. The Deutschland returned to her pier where it was found that her stem was twisted and several plates were badly damaged, necessitating repairs which were expected to take from one to two weeks.

The Pacific Wireless. An exchange of cordial greetings between President Wilson and the Emperor of Japan on November 14 marked the opening of commercial wireless operation between the United States and Japan. The messages from San Francisco to Tokyo are relayed at Honolulu. It is 2,087 miles from the Bolinas Ridge transmitting station near San Francisco to the Hawaiian wireless station at Kahuku near Honolulu, and 3,355 miles to the receiving station at Funabashi near Tokyo. Previous to the inauguration of this service, the longest commercial wireless route was 2,200 miles from Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, to England. The United States government is maintaining a neutrality censor at the relay station at Honolulu.

Fragments of News. Major General George W. Goethals, governor of the Panama Canal Zone, was at his own request placed on the retired list of the army on November 15. . . . Late returns made certain the election of Miss Jeannette Rankin as a representative in Congress from the state of Montana. In spite of her political activities, Miss Rankin is said to make her own hats and gowns and to be an expert at lemon meringue pie. She is thirty-four years old, about five feet four inches in height, slender, with light brown hair which her enemies call red. . . . News reports on November 12 showed strawberries ripening in a backyard in Chicago and the first snow of the season covering the ground in Maine. Reports were not available as to the condition of the political plum crop. . . . Reports from England show that there has been a great increase in juvenile crime since the war began, and Home Secretary Samuels is working with Sir R. Baden Powell and other leaders of juvenile movements to perfect plans to combat this condition. . . . The total vote of the Socialist party in the recent national election is reported as slightly in excess of 1,300,000. . . . Henry George, Jr., son of the famous exponent of the single tax, and an ardent follower in his father's footsteps, died in Washington November 14. . . . The cruiser Memphis, wrecked in a hurricane at Santo Domingo, will not be refloated, since the cost of salvage will be about $3,000,000, which the Navy Department considers in excess of the present value of the vessel. . . . Charles Edward Cheney, Bishop of the Chicago synod of the Reformed Episcopal Church and Senior Bishop of that church, died in Chicago on November 15. . . . Negotiations were completed on November 17, by which the New York Shipbuilding Company, which has extensive ship yards at Camden, N. J., was taken over by the American International Corporation. The capacity of e yards is to be increased. Orders now on d would keep the present yards busy thr gh 1917. About $15,000,000 is involved ir he purchase and reorganization of the comp y. . . . and have retreated on to Rumanian terri y. At one time three weeks ago these troo on this front had penetrated some sixty miles to Transylvania.

South of Kronstadt, on the north front he desperate battles in the several passe are running almost continuously one way, an he Teutons are slowly but steadily penetr ng farther and farther into Rumania. Muc he same condition of affairs is true sou of Hermannstadt.

The loss of artillery by the Rumania is even more important than the loss of en, since when Rumania plunged or was th wn into the war her army was not, to sa the least, over-well equipped with that absol ly necessary implement of modern warfare nd consequently any loss from a stock insuff nt at the beginning cuts deep.

On the Dobrudja front, since the f ng back of von Mackensen's army last week a line nearer the railroad, nothing new as taken place, according to both the Ru an and German reports, and the positions o he contending armies in that region appar tly have suffered no change for the last few ys.

RUSSIA has protested the institution o he Polish kingdom, declaring in a m o-randum to neutral powers her unalte ble intention to assure autonomy to all the l es. On November 16, the German Gov or General of Poland issued an edict recogn ng Judaism as a religion in public law, and his was followed by the announcement of ns whereby Polish Jews would be permitt to have a complete religious organization. he Jews were denied full liberty even in th old kingdom of Poland and their condition ler Russian administration is well known.

Faithful Unto Death

International Sunday School Lesson for December 10. Revelation 1

he Churches as Christ Sees Them

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HE second and third chapters of Revelation constitute one of the finest passages in all Scripture— letters to the Seven Churches in Asia. se letters are remarkable for their criptive power, their clear discrimina- n of the various conditions in the rches, and the suitableness of the utiful symbolic exhortations ad- ssed to each. These were actual rches, and the conditions described e the actual situations when John ote. He selected these seven as ical churches, and the principles in- ved apply universally to all the rches of Christ. The interpretation these as successive stages of church tory is to be rejected. In all ages se various types may be expected.

The Churches Characterized

HE following list may be of help in our study of these messages. The out- nding feature, expressed in present- terms, will furnish a key thought our reading.

phesus—the Church of Waning En- siasm.

myrna—the Persecuted Church.

ergamum—the Church in a Bad vironment.

hyatira—the Church of Increasing ivity.

ardis—the Dead-and-Alive Church.

hiladelphia—the Church on the eshold of Opportunity.

aodicea—the Self-Satisfied Church.

ote, too, how each letter has a salu- ion from the Lord Jesus in which a t of the symbolism of the vision of rist in chapter 1 is used. Also that h letter closes with a warning or a mise or both. One cannot fail to be ressed by the wonderful appropriate- s of the salutations and the promises. how they fit into the situation as we e interpreted it in each case.

Greetings and Challenges

O Ephesus, in danger of losing its zeal, Christ presents himself as sessor of the stars as well as of the dlesticks, the heavenly ideal and the thly counterpart of the churches. hesus is warned to trim her candle l let it shine like her star in heaven, her candlestick shall surely be re- ved. Persecuted Smyrna is greeted him who understood persecution to full, who was dead and is alive again. e faithful unto death and I will give e the crown of life," is her promise. Pergamum, the seat of Roman power, contending against Satan's forces, is saluted by her Master, who hath the sharp two-edged sword of a higher, a spiritual authority. The fleshly and the spiritual are in deadly opposition, and Pergamum is warned against taking the wrong side in the conflict.

The Live Church and the Dead Church

THYATIRA, the energetic, serviceable church, is greeted by Jesus, the Lord of seeing eyes and ready feet, and is commended for her growing usefulness. The beatitude of the good and faithful servant is promised—more work to do and higher authority and recognition. Sardis, the church in name only, is reminded that Christ had seven spirits and seven stars, but her light is almost quenched. She never completes the works she undertakes, and must repent ere it be too late. Yet even here the gracious Lord promises that the faithful few shall not be blotted out of the book of life.

The Open Door and the Closed Door

PHILADELPHIA, with opportunity bright even in the face of opposition, is admonished by Christ, the Keeper of the keys, and urged to remember that no one can shut the door he has unlocked before her. If she makes good she has a permanent place in the eternal temple, and her faithful workers shall enter the heavenly city. Laodicea, who thinks she is rich and needs nothing, is sternly rebuked by Him who is the Faithful and True Witness. With no glowing praise, she is given a testimony from on high of her poverty and blindness, and is counseled to seek the true riches of Christ and to anoint her eyes to a right apprehension of her spiritual failure. Even yet, one promise, one reminder: Christ stands at the door, the Christ who reproved her, and seeks admission into her cold heart, declaring fellowship still possible. But for church as for individual it is hard for them that have riches to enter the Kingdom.

Ephesus, the Big Church

OUR Lesson Committee has advised us to concentrate on the first three of these glorious epistles. Ephesus is John's own church, and located in the central metropolis to which the other towns here named looked for leadership. As a whole this big city church is faithful. She has activity, energy, steadfastness, zeal for correct doctrine, endurance under persecution, and perseverance in her task. That is indeed a splendid record for any group of the Lord's disciples. But there is one thing amiss, which if not remedied will undermine all, and even "remove the candlestick," eliminate the institution! That is a loss of love. One is reminded of Paul's letter to the Corinthians, with its catalog of talents which, without love, are absolutely nothing. Devotion to Christ is essential: a fervor of holy loyalty out of which unfolds the winsomeness to the unsaved, the compassion for the erring brother, the ministry of teaching and leading that truly edifies the community, builds others up in Christ. Some one has said that zeal for orthodox doctrine often tends to move the emphasis from love to creed, to intellectual assent instead of heart response. Fanaticism, at all events, tends to forget love. The "first love" of a soul to God, the radiant loyalty, the deep sense of gratitude, makes a Carlyle and a Luther alike look upon the beggar as a brother, and the sinful, even the blasphemous, with a mighty pity, an eager desire to save.

Smyrna, the Church in Trouble

THIS is an epistle of consolation and encouragement. No word of reproach can the Lord bring himself to bear upon those who are being sorely persecuted for his name's sake. He understands their tribulation. It was a city where the Jews were strong and influential, and withal filled with a bitter hostility to the new faith. Years after we read of the martyrdom of Polycarp, the famous bishop of Smyrna, and find the Jews rejoicing in the death of that grand old man, and breaking the Sabbath to lay fagots on the fire about his feet. The Roman authorities became the tools of this persecution.

No speedy deliverance is promised the suffering church. Some of her members are to undergo the horrors of ancient imprisonment and torture. "Fear not the things which thou art about to suffer." The time of tribulation will not be unduly long—"ten days," a short time, a few years. The martyrs of the Cross need have no fear of the "second death." Be faithful! Certain students say that this was the civic motto of Smyrna, and that her literature is full of references to her "crowns." The true citizens, the true Jews, are these Christian saints. Theirs too is the true civic fidelity, and to them shall be awarded the true crown, the crown of righteousness the crown of life

All this reminds us that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church; that persecuted churches have always been noted for zeal and devotion. We have things too easy today. We need more iron in our blood. We need a vision of the reality of the opposition we face, of the hideous selfishness and greed in the earth, and a genuine sense of our responsibility and our danger.

Pergamum, the Tempted Church

THIS church was beset by hostility from without and insidious temptation within. As we have seen in the case of Smyrna, the former was more successfully resisted. The attempts to force emperor worship on the disciples had already led to the death of one of their leaders, Antipas, but the church never flinched. Rome herself could not bend these men to idolatry, nor to a denial of their Christian doctrines. They held fast Christ's name, they did not deny his faith, despite the organized effort to enthrone the Roman pagan nationalism supreme over their city.

The real danger menacing this church was different. It was the false teaching of the Nicolaitans, of men who "called themselves apostles." This vicious heresy in the early church was based largely on a false interpretation of salvation by faith in Christ. Being set free from the law, these men made their liberty an occasion for the flesh. Paul encountered them at Corinth practicing licentiousness while professing a high Christian philosophy. He exclaims to the Romans, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid."

Immorality and self-indulgence are fatal to any church. Though not many at Pergamum had fallen so low, it was a cancer which might affect the whole body. Severe measures must be taken to check the contamination. This is a vital issue in some of our modern churches, though the basis of the wrongdoing is different and even less excusable. A fine creed, a loyal allegiance to the name, a faithful adherence to worship and to doctrine—these cannot be compatible with a bad reputation in the community, or secret sins of the flesh, or covetousness of riches and pleasures. Yet some attempt the combination.

These then are the churches as Christ sees them. These are the hindrances and these the graces that characterize his professed representatives today. Perhaps we may humbly compare our own church home with Ephesus or with Philadelphia and thrill with hope of renewed zeal and new opportunities to come. Perhaps we sadly see some likeness to Laodicea or to Sardis, and are greatly grieved at the thought. Yet the final impress of this lesson should be a sense of Christ's watchfulness above his own and of the possibility of his living presence in the midst of the golden candlestick of the church visible. And every one of us has the chance to manifest him to the world for which he died.

Render Unto Caesar

tor preached on the same theme that stirring the hearts of other congre- ions. He sat just as stiffly, just as ight, with his lips drawn into just as n and hard a line at the close of the vice as at the first. The minister's e drew a sigh of regret as she watched n, and prayed that the arrow of con- tion and repentance might strike p into "his cruel old heart."

he could not know, as God knew, t sermon, minister, and congregation l all vanished from the old man's sciousness, and that in fancy he sat e more at the head of the Thanks- ing feast in the old home, and looked h joyful pride at the ones whose sence had made it so delightful—the e who had died of a broken heart, daughter who had lost her life in a tant land, the handsome son whose ndesirable marriage" had since that e caused his father to disown and dis- erit him.

"Make Thanksgiving what you would st desire it to be." That was the one tence that Uncle Jerry took home h him. It took the flavor from his ex- lent Sunday dinner. It annihilated Sunday nap. It walked ghostlike ide him on his Sunday afternoon oll. It haunted his dreams and stared n in the face when morning peeped at the window. Finally, it rode with him to the telegraph office the next day, and smiled over his shoulder as he wrote:

Santa Morena, November 25.
John Stevens, Glenwood, Arizona.
Come home for Thanksgiving, and bring all the family. Father.

ACCORDING to arrangements, the drummer from the city arrived in Santa Morena on the early train that eventful Thursday morning. He telephoned to the editor, and announced that he would meet him at the Methodist church in time for services, but that until that time he desired to stroll about the streets and "see the fun."

A few days before he would have smiled cynically to behold Grandma Perkins hobble across the street with a cup of sugar, and stop to chat affably with a neighbor who was carrying a couple of eggs to the same place; or people returning books, umbrellas, sheet music, articles of clothing, and kitchen utensils. These surely were ludicrous sights, and they produced a general spirit of hilarity, accompanied by all sorts of jokes and merry laughter and universal good feeling that made one glad to be up and out, and especially glad to be an inhabitant of Santa Morena on this auspicious morning.

And then the friendly words that fell upon one's ears were quite as interesting.

"Now, honey, just thank your ma for me. I'd plumb forgot about those eggs, but it's lucky she forgot to return 'em sooner, for I was just wishin' I had a couple more for my pudding; so they come in just right."

Trifling matters? No. Nothing is trifling that renews friendships, awakens kindly spirits, or brings good cheer, convenience, comfort, even in small amounts.

William Curtis looked upon these unusual scenes with an appreciative eye and a warm smile. Why? Because in his vest pocket he carried a telegram from "Jim," which revealed how opportune that fifty dollars had been, even though the words were few. William's heart warmed at the mere remembrance of those grateful words, and the assurance in himself that he had "done the right thing" at last. He could only guess at the debts paid, the loans returned, the reparation of word and deed, which were evidenced by the bright, relieved faces he met, the kindly words he overheard.

At the Thanksgiving services an audience taxed the capacity of the largest church in town, and caused the hearts of the six pastors to thrill with joy. Curtis told himself that he had never heard more heartfelt, uplifting music, and credited his own joyful conscience with the thanksgiving praise; for he could not possibly know that back of Herbert Wilson's splendid bass notes lay the blessed knowledge that Thanksgiving Day was to be "what he most desired."

He knew, from the stir that swept through the congregation, that something entirely out of the ordinary had happened when Uncle Jerry Stevens hobbled proudly up the aisle to the old family pew, followed by "John and the family," but no other event of that eventful day so thrilled the souls of the townspeople as this evidence of reconciliation between the relentless old man and his son.

"HOW did the Santa Morena proposition work out?" questioned a reporter friend when he met the drummer in the city the next day.

"Fine! Fine! It couldn't have been better. Say, Benson, there never was a truer assertion than the one that preacher made when he said: 'You must "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" before you can truly "render unto God the things that are God's."' "

DESPITE my record and my principles, well known to all who were instrumental in securing my appointment, I was made a member of the city police force in June of 1900. There, of course, I had all sorts of opportunity for inside information on the ponies. I knew all the pool rooms and all the bookmakers. In addition, there were always crooks and gamblers anxious to stand in with the cops, and thus I was always getting good tips.

Never in my life had I gambled so recklessly. I could think of nothing else and did nothing else. In all the time I was on the force I didn't do one honest day's work. I didn't have to. I was in right at first, and after that I didn't care or know what I did, for I was nearly dead from drink and all else that went with the life I was leading.

It was while on the force, and in my uniform, too, that I escaped being a murderer by the smallest possible margin. I had left my beat to get a drink at a joint which was being run by the favorite of a man well up in city affairs. The place was a favorite hang-out for members of the force, officers as well as patrolmen. I was drunk at the time. An Italian stood at the bar. We had never seen one another before. He misunderstood a drunken jeer I made to a friend, and he called me a name not even a low-down thief would tolerate. Blind with rage, I picked up a full bottle of seltzer, raised it high above my head, and brought it down on the top of his skull with all my strength. Again the politicians! They sent me into retirement for three days while the affair was hushed up. The man didn't die, although it was five weeks before the doctors would admit he could live. On the fourth day I returned to my work. Fifty dollars' worth of cigars and liquors squared off my indebtedness to the gang who had covered up for me!

Any man unfamiliar with the human dregs who populate certain sections of New York would not believe that I could have gone any lower down the social scale. But I was a long way from the bottom still!

Before long the day came when even my friends the politicians could no longer afford to cover my tracks—to back me up in the front office. Shortly thereafter I was transferred to a precinct on Staten Island. There I went gambling without restraint. My nerves broke completely in two for the first time. I was heavily in debt. My courage was gone and I was on the verge of the D. T.'s. I hadn't a cent! My room rent was due and the landlord was insisting on payment. Had I been able to go to New York I would have stolen or borrowed the few necessary dollars from my wife.

As I left the station-house that night I raised a twenty-five cent loan and bought a vial of poison—for a dog, I told the druggist, but in reality it was for something far worse than a dog. I was through with it all and had decided to go the "Dutch route." I wrote a couple of letters, sealed them, and then locked the door to my room from the inside. I thought I was a man. I didn't know how big a coward I was. I removed my coat, vest, trousers, shirt and shoes, and stood in my underwear with a big flask of whisky in one hand and the vial of acid in the other. Try as I would I couldn't master sufficient courage to drink the stuff. A dozen times the vial got almost to my lips, but no farther. Not so the whisky, however, and I finally fell to the floor in a dead, drunken stupor. In the morning I threw the poison down a sink. That debauch lasted about three days, for I made a killing early that day in a pool-room and cashed in about twenty.

When I finally returned to my station-house I found serious charges, which I could not successfully beat, had been preferred against me. I removed my shield, unbuckled my belt, and turned in my gun and stick. I had beaten a dismissal by only a few days!

CHAPTER XIII

My Last Prison Term

BACK in New York again, and without money, without pull, without friends. No! that was not so! I knew there was one who was still my friend—my wife! She had moved, and I had some little difficulty in locating her. Then I found that one of her former loyal friends, a member of her old church, was again in touch with her.

Jane was glad to see me—she cried and implored me to stay and to behave myself. This, of course, I readily agreed to do, and I did so until she got together a few spare dollars, and then I left and took the money with me. I did not see her again until I was sentenced to six years at hard labor in Sing Sing Prison by Judge Cowing.

With the few dollars she gave me I got beastly drunk. I met an old acquaintance, who tipped me off to a good thing. I needed money quickly if I was to make use of this information. A car soon brought me to the home of my wife's old friend, this woman who was again befriending her. On other occasions I had stolen from her, but because of her friendship for Jane, she had refused to prosecute me. I entered her house and stole an expensive silver service. I was caught, tried, convicted, sentenced, and away I went, with my wife promising me her continued love and support and begging me to turn over a new leaf. Again I promised her I would.

I was an interesting and strange creature as with nineteen others I was taken via the New York Central to Sing Sing to serve my last "bit." The fact that I was going to the "stir" didn't disturb me. I felt no shame or remorse over that. Nor did I regret the act for which I had been sent away. My friends had deserted me; the old "pull," which had safeguarded me so many times, had been withdrawn and I was sore. I wanted to get even.

One by one the big events in my life passed in review before my eyes. I saw my mother and my father. I saw the judge who drove me out of St. Louis as a boy. I saw the screws and keepers who had mauled and beaten me in all the different places where I had done time. And then I saw my wife in her poverty and anguish of heart. So far as any effect was concerned, I might as well have been thinking of the moon or the stars. All emotion, all feeling of right, all honor was buried in me. Buried under years of dissipation and sin, buried so completely that I was as vicious and heartless a man as ever lived.

Life in the various "stirs" I'd been in taught me one thing well—to obey rules. Not because they were rules, or because it was right to obey rules, but because the powers that made them had sticks loaded at the end with lead, and guns and pistols and solitary punishment cells and the power to deprive me of food and water; and all I had was a pair of bare fists. And bare fists against a dozen armed screws didn't stack up good. As a rule, prison authorities have no trouble with second, third and fourth termers. They're wise! Their spirit has been broken. It's only the new fellows, the men with spirit and blood, full of life and fight, that cause trouble in prisons! And instead of taking that spirit and blood and fight and directing it in the right direction, they kill it—grind it out of a man, crush his very soul, make him detest himself for being alive, and make him hate with a fury that would kill if it got the chance. And then those men are turned loose and expected to go straight—expected to be good!

During the whole of my stay I locked on "The Flats." That's ground floor of the cell house. only eighty-two years old, and only been condemned about eight ti For eighty-two years human be have been thrown into "The Fla where the large majority, myself of them, contracted rheumatism. I got along fairly well because I haved myself. Being an ex-cop, I accepted only by a choice few as all O. K. You'll wonder pe how anything could make me less man than I was, but the conditions mentioned did do that, as they d the case of every man who lived them. Such a result was inevitable

Christian Missions in Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE Indians of Alaska are almost all Christians. For several generations the missionaries have been working among them, and the property and life of the stranger is now safe all the way from Ketchikan to Point Barrow. When the Russians discovered the country the natives were savages; and ten years after we took possession Sitka and St. Michael were armed trading posts where the Eskimos were shut out at night that the inhabitants might rest in safety. For years not a single whaler dared to stay over night at C e Prince of Wales, and the man who traveled through the wilds took his life in his hands. Today one can go alone by dog sled through any part of Alaska and feel safe.

The mission work has been done by churches of many denominations, and it is still going on in all parts of the territory. The first mission work done was that of the Russians. They began to convert the Indians of the Aleutian Islands more than a hundred years ago, and today there are more Greek Christians among the natives of Alaska than either Protestants or Catholics. It is said that that church has more than 10,000 communicants, whereas the Protestants and Catholics have altogether less than 2,000. The Greek Church has still something like sixty places of worship scattered over the territory. It has a cathedral at Sitka, a large church at Juneau, and there are mission stations here and there throughout the interior.

The Presbyterians have done a great work in Alaska. The board of home missions sent Dr. Sheldon Jackson here about forty years ago. He established the Indian training schools at Sitka and a girls' home there, and in conne with S. Hall Young and others o ized missions throughout the Alex Archipelago, including those of gell, Sitka, Howkan and Haines. farthest north mission in Alaska Point Barrow. It does work amon whalers and Eskimos, and has great influence in that part of th ritory. Altogether the Presbyt have about sixteen churches, of twelve are for natives. It was Dr. son who did most in the introducti the reindeer into Alaska and th tablished a stock-raising industry is making many of the Eskimos a dians rich.

The Society of Friends is work the Far North. It has three mi about Kotzebue Sound, which ope upon the Arctic Ocean. Its school is one of the largest among the Es and its missions are noted for their lent work in training men to take the reindeer.

The work of the Moravians is re

). They are in one of the least-wn parts of Alaska. Their missions along the Kuskokwim River and on west coast. The largest is at hel, not far from the mouth of the r, a place until recently reached by the native kayaks or skin boats. ng to the work of the coast survey, mers can now go up the Kuskokwim hundreds of miles and the mission plies can come in on large ships. Bethel mission was established more thirty years ago. The Moravian sions are doing well with their rein-. The Eskimos about Bethel have en hundred, and in the last midwin- holidays they had what might be d a reindeer contest or fair, to stim- e an interest in all matters connected deer raising. There were speed ests in loading and lashing sleds and d races. There were premiums for best lassoing of an unbroken deer, best and quickest harnessing and hing, and in driving deer for a ter of a mile, a half mile and longer. men practiced foot races and the ien brought in baked bread for s. The Moravian missions have about eight hundred Eskimos ng their members.

he Catholic missions are largely aged by the Jesuit Fathers. There nearly one hundred stations, of h seventeen are provided with resi- priests. Nineteen of the missions chapels. There are also a number chools and several convents. The lren are taught to read and write. boys learn trades and the girls to , sew and keep house.

ne Episcopal Church is pushing its in Alaska. It opened a mission school at Anvik on the Lower Yu- in 1887, and it has steadily extended perations in the shape of schools, itals and churches since then. Some s work is devoted to the Eskimos especially that at Point Hope, which station on the Arctic Ocean above ng Strait.

iring my stay at Fairbanks I met Rev. Hope Lumpkin, who is in ge of the mission there. He is edi- f the Alaskan Churchman and is the nator, I believe, of the custom of ting and distributing old maga- to the mining camps. These izines are sent by people from all the States to Mr. Lumpkin at banks. He gets from fifteen to ty thousand copies a year. The izines are done up into bundles, containing some heavy reading and light reading. The miners call for and carry them on their prospect- rips over the country. They are to be of great value during the long y winters, and some men have said they have been the only thing that between them and insanity.

o of the most remarkable mission- of Alaska belong to the Episco- ns. The first of these is the Rev. . Rowe, who came here in 1895 as rst Bishop of Alaska, and the other hdeacon Stuck, noted for his work g the Indians, and also for having one of the first men to reach the top ount McKinley. Bishop Rowe has done as much, if not more, than any other one man in the Christianizing of interior Alaska. He has traveled thousands of miles over the trails in his winter journeys in Alaska, and he has visited every navigable part of the country by steamboat and canoe. He is not only bishop and traveling missionary, but he is also doctor and nurse, and his work is free to all.

Bishop Stringer of the Church of England, now in charge of the work in Yukon territory, with headquarters at Dawson, is known all over Canada as the bishop who had to eat his boots to keep from starvation.

He ate his boots.

Bishop Stringer came from Canada to Hershel Island, which lies in the Arctic Ocean not far from the Mackenzie River. It is noted as a whaling station, and in some winters more than 700 whalers live there in order that they may start their business with the first break-up of the ice in the spring. Bishop Stringer's work was among the whalers as well as among the Eskimos. When he came there the latter were the tools of the whalers. They had no sense of property rights, and they were sunken and degraded to a remarkable degree. Through the Christian work of tho Hershel Mission, the character of tho race has practically changed. The most of the Eskimos are now Christians, and they are advancing in civilization.

"It is astonishing," said Bishop Stringer, "how eager the Eskimos are to become Christians, and what ardent Christians they are. Recently we had two hundred volunteers who asked to be missionaries and who were ready to start upon an expedition of church work that would involve an absence of two years from home."

The Bishop of the Yukon has under his religious direction a territory as large as Germany. It consists of Yukon Territory and the country east of it, running almost to Hudson Bay. It is the most northerly mission in the British empire and the most of its work is in the wilds. It was during one of his trips through that region that Bishop Stringer had his narrow escape from starving. He had finished inspecting the Eskimo missions along the Arctic Ocean and had started homeward over the Rocky Mountains to Dawson. He was traveling on foot, his only companion being a lay preacher named Johnson. After a while they ran short of food. They wero far away from any settlement and starvation stared them in the face. For days they lived on roots, nuts and stewed squirrel. Now and then they shot a ptarmigan and at one time killed a grouse.

During all this time they had no quarrels as to the division of the food. The bishop told me that most men lose their sense of what is right under such conditions. They are prone to suspect their fellows, and quarrels and deaths have been caused through the belief that ono man gets more than the other. The bishop prevented this by agreeing with Johnson that turn about one of them should always make the division of the food portions allotted for each meal and the other should then have the right to pick which of the two portions he desired.

"For instance," said Bishop Stringer, "our meal might be the head and the leg of a ptarmigan. After it was over we would discuss which part had the most nourishment. We finally decided on the head. We each lost fifty pounds during that journey."

I asked the bishop to tell me about eating his boots. He replied:

"We did not do that until we were out of all other food. We should have starved had we not eaten them, and it was only because the boots were of the kind used by the Eskimos that we were able to eat them. Boots made of leather tanned and dressed in the ordinary way could not be eaten. The boots we had were of sealskin dried without tanning. They reached to our knees and contained quite a good deal of hide. Our first experiment with them was not a success. They had been greased night after night and the oil had turned rancid. The taste was such that it was impossible to swallow or chew the skin. At last we tried boiling it and then toasting it. The toasting took away some of the taste, and after that we were able to consume thom. With the exception of a few bits, we had eaten two pairs of boots when we were found." The bishop showed me some of the pieces left over which he has kept as a relic. They are as black as ink and look liko vulcanized rubber.

Here is an extract from the bishop's diary of the day they were found.

"Thursday, October 21, 1909.—Breakfast off of sealskin boots, soles and tops, boiled and toasted. Soles better than uppers. Soup from small scraps of bacon and scrapings of the flour barrel. The last we have. Tired. Hands sore. Took a long time to pack up. Concluded we were in the Peel River country. Heard children's voices in the distance and then saw houses on left hand about a mile ahead. We stopped and thanked God for bringing us to human habitation."

During that trip the bishop had started out to the Eskimos in May, leaving Mrs. Stringer at Dawson. He was then on his way home. He stayed only a fortnight to rest and recuperate from his thrilling experience, and then walked 800 miles to rejoin his family.

ARLY dusk in New England. Snow and a fast-fading light in the western sky. Stark, thorny s, and a fir tree or two outlined st the horizon. And, the very te of the picture, a small gray gure, wrapped in a great cloak of spun, battling with the wind.

e father of Grateful was an earnest man, with a high purpose and ideals. He had scarcely noticed ful's mother until he saw her, her very soul in her eyes, gazing on the new land.

"What a beautiful face!" he had thought. "How the sunset light touches her hair!" For Grateful's father had laid aside an artist's palette when he embraced the new roligion. The Pilgrims were too sober-minded to enjoy art.

They wero married during that dreadful first winter, the mother and father of Grateful. How they managed to struggle through the terrible hardships no one knew, for the woman was delicate and the man unpractical. But they won out, and when the spring came they planted a little garden patch with hardy vegetable seed brought from England. There wore a few flowers in the garden—Grateful's mother never quite understood who had planted them there.

And then came autumn. And with the autumn came harvest—a harvest of gold and red and russet brown. And the settlers, seeing a happier winter before them, decided to make a great feast of thanksgiving to God. And the housewives baked and roasted and brewed in preparation.

It was on the morning of the feast day that Grateful was born. They named her Grateful because they were glad that their garden had prospered, that their grain was harvested, and because, above all, they were glad to have her. "I hope that she will love beauty," said her father when he first saw her small puckered faco. "I hope that she will love God!" said Grateful's mother softly. There was a note of reproof in her tone.

So was Grateful born on Thanksgiving day—born with a heritage of faith and hope and high purpose, and with a latent talent at the tips of her small fingers.

HER father died in the midst of that second winter when she was still a small baby, and the mother, seeing his

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter

Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.50.

BLUE STREAKS

These Bicycle Tires Must Serve You Well

$2.50
Each

Guaranteed

Here is a message to the bicycle-riding boy:

You, who are pushing the pedals on your bike today, will probably be throwing in the clutch on your very own automobile before long.

You will be a customer for Goodyear Automobile Tires.

Or you may become a manufacturer requiring Goodyear Belting, or in charge of a power plant where Goodyear*ite*, the wonderful asbestos packing, could be used.

The Goodyear Company cannot risk your displeasure now by selling you a poor bicycle tire and thus lose your future business.

Nor can they, for the trifling sum of two dollars and a half—the price of a Blue Streak Bicycle Tire—lose your father's confidence, for he may be a Goodyear customer now.

The Goodyear Company knows that Blue Streaks will serve you faithfully and well.

That they will uphold the fine name of Goodyear.

Blue Streaks mean a long life of service—handsome appearance—speed.

death as only another sacrifice, tried to smile.

"It is God's will," she said. "He could never—exactly—have been one of us." And, quite absently, she thought of the spot of color that the vagrant flowers had made as they bloomed in her garden.

Small Grateful grew fast. Children do grow fast in a land where there is little time for play, and a vague fear, always, of death at the hands of a famine ghost or a live redskin. Grateful grew fast, and as she grew she learned to spin and cook and keep the house clean. And yet, sometimes, as she paused in her workaday tasks, she was struck by the beauty all around her.

"Mother," she said one day, "why don't you ever look at the sea? It is as blue—as heaven."

"Grateful!" The mother's voice was shocked. "Thou art scarcely reverent!"

"Mother," she said another time when they were spinning, "my cloak that we will make—may we not dye it red with berry-stain? I am weary of gray—"

But the mother had paused in her task and she answered sternly,

"Thou art worldly, Grateful! And gay colors are sinful!" Even as she said it she remembered the words that her husband had said as he gazed, for the first time, on his small daughter.

But it was when the mother, inviting an elder to dine with them, came home unexpectedly and found Grateful drawing pictures on the hearth with a bit of charcoal while the table lay all unset, that she really began to worry about the state of her daughter's soul. She turned to the elder and pointed tragically at the child who was so absorbed in her work.

"It is a devil in her—it is vanity!" said the mother.

"It must be crushed out of her," said the elder. "Art is for unbelievers." And so Grateful was sent to bed, supperless, and prayed over. The next Sunday she was made the subject of a fiery sermon as she sat, an uncomfortable but unrepentant little sinner, on the hard bench that had been assigned to her. But despite criticism, despite the religion of the Puritans, it was neither vanity nor the devil that had prompted Grateful to draw pictures on the hearthstone. It was the spirit of her artist father speaking to her through a gift of God.

Grateful, for a while, suffered a mild form of social ostracism. But the winter was just coming, and the Indians were muttering vague threats; so she was able, before long, to sink back into obscurity. Elders and worried matrons began to talk of provisions and blockades instead of pictures and bright colors. And so Grateful, unable to do her loved work at home, would often steal away into the woods. No one knew that she crushed wild flowers and herbs and berries into red and green and purple inks. Nobody knew that she still dreamed of pictures, and red coats, and the sunlight on the sea.

EARLY dusk in New England. November, and snow, and fir trees outlined starkly against the sky. And Grateful, a small girl-figure wrapped in a great gray coat, battling against the wind.

The child's heart was heavy as she felt the keenness of that wind. She did not fear the winter for its own sake, but she knew that soon the drifting snow would make it impossible for her to go to the woods and mix colors and dab gloriously at flat stones and sunken logs. Well, she would paint one more picture—a picture to last for all the months that she would have to be spinning. She would not wash it away, as she had washed away the pictures that she made on the stones and the sunken trees. She would let God's own snow and rain erase it in his own time. She would paint it on—what? Oh, how she longed, with an unformulated desire, for one of the canvases that her father had painted on!

The elders had said that Grateful was ungodly. But God answered her prayer—even though it was an unformulated prayer. Straight and proud and tall, pallid beside the dark fir trees, stood a white birch. As Grateful, coming slowly through the woods, looked at it, she could see pictures on

The services been enthusiastically supported by the d men, the regimental band furnishing usic and the various companies taking in making plans and preparations for the es and in furnishing the ushers. Since giment has been on the border the scope work has been broadened and men of regiments have been interested in the gs, the audiences sometimes numbering l thousand.

ECIAL "Help Our Church" campaign emphasize loyalty to church and de- ational agencies is announced by the s Christian Endeavor Union. In Novem- e societies will concentrate their efforts securing of subscriptions for denomina- papers and religious magazines. December is set apart for prayer for Denominational Missions and for a campaign for Comrades of the Quiet Hour. From January to March an organized effort will be made, through a "Find a Friend" evangelistic campaign, to increase the attendance of young people at church. Decision days are set for February 4 and Easter Sunday. During April, which has been set apart as "Tithing and Self-Denial Month," special efforts will be made to promote increased giving to denominational missions.

EVANGELIST E. S. STUCKER recently closed a union meeting at Oxford, Kan., and began a similar effort at Argonia, Kan. He will open a meeting at Tulsa, Okla., about November 13.

EVANGELIST E. A. CORBETT conducted a series of meetings at the Methodist Church at Ludlow, Vt., beginning October 8.

THIS desolation, doubly desolate, is the gorge of the Brook Cherith in the Jordan Valley, whose limestone cliffs hid the prophet Elijah from the wrath of Ahab. Here the ravens fed the prophet while the wicked king and the people over whom he ruled suffered the pangs of famine. The rain ceased, the crops failed, the king raged in his impotence, but the prophet, solitary and alone beside the dwindling brook, had daily proof of the watchful care of Jehovah, whose word he had obeyed. Then, when the brook failed for lack of rain, God led Elijah to the home of the widow of Zarephath. The place is still desolate, and you wonder what living thing the Arab in the picture can be aiming at. The gorge is now called the Wady Kelt, and in a snug corner of the canyon walls nestles the old Elijah convent, in which Greek monks commemorate the long vigil of the prophet of Israel. Possibly instead of ravens they are fed by tourists—who knows? The convent and the brook are thus described by Marion Harland in "The Home of the Bible":

"Down the Wady Kelt, which by and by runs parallel with our road, wears a fierce little brook, brawling so noisily that we can hear it before we can see it.

"'The Brook Cherith,' David (the guide) names it, and we have enough to think and talk of for the next mile. We alight then, and, quitting the track, clamber over intervening hills and gullies to reach the cliff at whose base foams the fussy torrent. It will shrink to a tiny rivulet in summer, and is making the most of its day of power. Right over against us, scarcely distinguishable in the shadow of the perpendicular wall opposite from the rock to which it clings, is a miniature edition of a Greek convent. Those who founded it believed, or said that they believed, the site to be near Elijah's hiding-place during the miraculous drought that plagued the land in Ahab's reign. They named it, however, the Monastery of St. John, the Elijah of the New Testament. is marvelous how the materials for bu d-ing even so tiny an edifice were tr s-ported to the chosen spot, althoug ve trace again upon the face of the p ci-pice thread-like paths along which ld goats might fear to tread. The mo s-tery seems actually to 'back up' ag st the grim wall as if afraid of falling.

Defy Evil

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
I Kings 21 : 15–22.

SHALL we defy evil? Dare we? Naboth defied the evil designs of King Ahab and suffered death at the hands of Jezebel. Evil recks little of law or life or human rights. Defying evil is sometimes dangerous business. But Elijah dared. He met the craven Ahab in the stolen vineyard and read him the sentence of Jehovah upon his sins. He who goes to do the will of God dares defy evil; for what power it has over him is limited to time and earth, and it is much better to die well than to live unworthily. But there is another side to this lesson. Ahab defied his evil deeds to harm him. As king in Israel he felt able to construe the law to his own advantage, to take what he coveted at whatever cost, to disregard even the expressed will of God; and he thought he could do all this and win happiness and prosper. He did not realize that he must pay the reckoning of his misdeeds. He did not recognize in Ahab his own worst enemy, but greeted the messenger of God with "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" And Ahab and Jezebel died miserably. There are many more today who defy evil in the sense that Ahab did, rather than as did the prophet, and evil still serves its votaries as it served Ahab. The wage of sin remains at the old scale; it is still death. But the gift of God is still eternal life.

The Mission of the Religious Newspaper

Epworth League Topic. Hab. 2 : 2.

RELIGION, tho religion of Jehovah as revealed in Jesus, is the greatest thing in the world, the greatest need of the world, and its story is the greatest message ever given to the world. The next greatest story is the tale of unfolding human life as it develops day by day. This is news. The religious newspaper therefore is charged with the important task of giving the daily news of the world in the light of the eternal news of God's love and justice, of Christ's life and sacrifice. The religious newspaper occupies a place of suprem m-portance in our national life. It ties to he the forces that work for righteousness l bo-coming the common vehicle of communi ion between them. It carries to all the peop the messages of those whom God has chos fo leadership, multiplying a thousandfold hei outreach. It fosters movements that ma fo righteousness, for more efficient Chr ian living, for better churches. It labels v n mark of caution movements and indiv ual that appear sinister, and it moves with the power of pitiless publicity against si nc wickedness and sham and false pretens Ou religious life without religious news en would be circumscribed, provincial and l ely futile, and without direction; our gre de nominational and interdenominational ve-ments would lose their principal avenue ap-proach to the individual member; our on churches would find it hard to help the v ke ones; our great preachers would reacl nly those within the sound of their voices, a ou whole Christian enterprise would be ndi-capped, circumscribed and thrown bacl ard

A Preacher's Close Shave

H. W. ELLIOTT, of Sulphur, Ky., —"Brother" Elliott, as he is familiarly known to mountain people—is secretary and treasurer of the State Missions for the Christian Church. Only once in his twenty-five years in the so-called feud and moonshine country has a revolver been raised against him. On that occasion Mr. Elliott was riding in a train. In the seat ahead sat a brawny mountaineer and his wife. The man was puffing vigorously on a cigar. The conductor was a timid man, apparently. Anyway, he said nothing to the smoker, nor did any one else in the car.

Finally Brother Elliott spoke:

"Friend, you've made a mistake. The smoking-car is ahead of this one."

At that the mountaineer sprang to his feet with an oath and swung around facing Mr. Elliott. In the man's hand was a huge revolver, which he leveled at the state secretary's breast.

Diplomacy saved the day:

"I thought you were a gentleman," said Brother Elliott. "That's why I spoke. I knew if you were a gentleman you would want me to tell you that you were in the wrong car."

That made the mountaineer stop to think. At last, with a smile, he dropped the revolver back into its holster and held out his hand to the preacher.

"That was the closest shave I ever had," said the secretary.

Mr. Elliott has preached time and time again in places where feuds were in progress, and has often tarried in feud districts long enough to establish churches, and from residents of the wealthy blue grass section he gets money to support the preachers he leaves behind.

"The mountain people are the kindest-hearted folk in the world," said Brother Elliott. "I had rather trust myself in the hands of even the principal in a feud than to go into some sections of our large cities." JOHN H. ALLEN.

DEAF?

I Have 265,000 DEAF FRIENDS!

As President of the General Acoustic Company since its organization 16 years ago, I have made these friends by sparing no expense in producing the most powerful and most efficient hearing devices possible — by urging every person to try the Acousticon in his home and business without a penny of cost—and finally by convincing every purchaser that my interest in him is just as strong after a sale as before—that I am never too busy to take a personal interest in his case so long as he remains hard of hearing. We now announce a new model, stronger, smaller, better than ever in every detail, and I again invite every person hard of hearing to try the

No Deposit FREE No Expense

After you have given it any test that you choose, it is entirely for you to say whether you will keep or return it—at least you will know whether you are among the hundreds of thousands of fortunate ones to whom it does restore normal hearing. And it will have cost you nothing to try—not a cent.

WARNING! There is no good reason why everyone should not make as liberal a trial offer as we do. So do not send any money for any instrument for the deaf until you have tried it.

The ACOUSTICON has improvements and patented features which cannot be duplicated. So no matter what you have tried in the past, send for free trial of the ACOUSTICON today and convince yourself--you alone to decide. Address me personally if you prefer. K. M. TURNER, Pres.,

WHEN A MAN'S A MAN is a story, true, of the real heart of the life of the unfenced land of ranch and range of Northern Arizona.

A Girl Graduate Says, "WHEN A MAN'S A MAN" is so clean, so wholesome, so uplifting that it impels me to shout from the house-tops to every young man and every young woman in the land and implore them to read this wonderful story of manhood. It just thrills with interest. It strikes the responsive chord of your heart's purest and best wishes and desires.

The New York Times: There is much of the vigorous outdoor life of the Southwest in the story, and Mr. Wright writes of it with knowledge and with graphic truth.

Messenger of the Sacred Heart: Through it runs a pretty love story that has the charm of being sweet and clean.

The Continent, Chicago: Harold Bell Wright knows you and me, our temptations, our sins, our struggles, our hopes of triumph over ourselves and also the certainty of our triumph, if we go straight after the task and with the proper leading, stick at it until victory comes. He writes of life as it is lived and of you and me as we live it. * * The novel is an inspiration.

Questions and Answers

REV. J. B. TRAVIS, First Baptist Church, Stockton, Calif. In the Mail-Bag for August 23 I note your reply to Mrs. I. B. L., Missouri, and while I agree with you from that standpoint, I should like to present another side. What the sister laments and is grieving over is that she is unable to do any aggressive Christian work. Simply to be and suffer sweetly is not enough to satisfy the longings of her soul. Every one engaged in Christian work is aware of the awful dearth of intercessory prayer. There is much prayer of a sort; but real, definite prayer that waits upon the Lord and yet waits on behalf of souls is a rare quantity. In connection with the work of Finney and Moody, and in fact with all great revivals, we find the basis of their success laid in the prevailing prayer of faithful souls. This "ministry of intercession," as Andrew Murray terms it in his book of that title, is just as vital, just as essential, just as real a ministry as preaching, or testifying, or visiting the sick, or any of the other numerous and more public acts which are called Christian service. The sister whose question you answered may serve her church her denomination and the world possibly more really and effectively than if she were in the bloom of health, and were hurried from one meeting to another and taken up with household cares. Is not this far better than to simply suffer and endure and wait? To my mind it is—and there is such a dearth in this department of the Lord's work that she can do a work absolutely unique and original. As a pastor, it has been my privilege and joy to bring this message to many who thought they were set aside by sickness, or old age, or something that made them "shut-ins." And it has also been my joy to have the blessed assurance that I have been upheld and upborne by the prayers of those who were unable to attend the meetings of the church but whose ministry in prayer was absolutely essential to the spirituality and power of the church. Therefore I am glad to bring this word of hope to the sister and to have you pass on to others that which has been of so great blessing to me.

We heartily endorse Pastor Travis' letter, d commend it to the very large class of good hristian people who are not called or have opportunity to do aggressive Christian rk personally. As the prayers of Moses and cooperation of Aaron and Hur in holding his hands (Exod 17 12) helped win the tory over Amalek, so the "ministry of tercession" from humble hearts brings the iritual reinforcement that decides many a ruggle against the forces of sin.

Mrs. F. S. Carson, of the M. E. Biblical hool at Hinghwa, Fukien, China, writes: Some time ago a member of our mission sent u a note asking for bundles of the Christian erald covers, and we have received a good any bundles. We are very grateful for them he pictures of Palestine we have mounted ith the description in Chinese and are using em in our classes studying the Gospels and e others we have given to the children, ostly at Christmas time. The pictures all ean Scripture stored in the minds of the ildren of China, and only the Lord of the rvest knows the fruit they may bear." rely this is a good way to use the pictures, aking them preach the Gospel to the athen. We thank those friends who responded to the appeal.

. R., Greensboro, Ga. I am shut in at home with an invalid mother, and have very little opportunity to talk with Christian people. I am troubled and perplexed about this war and preparedness. The Bible is the Christian's rule of life and conduct. Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour is our pattern of life. God says, "Thou shalt not kill." Jesus says, "Love one another, even as I have loved you." While Jesus was here, there was no fighting done to save his life or honor. When he was reviled, he reviled not again. Does it not seem that those twelve who went about with him, should have been prepared to defend their Lord and themselves? Peter did have a sword, but what did Jesus say to him? "Put up thy sword." Jesus knew that he was kept by the power of his Father and could have called and twelve legions of angels would have been sent to him. In God's Word we read, "We are kept by the power of God." I think yet a while Satan tempts us, as he tried to tempt our Lord, with the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. How the United States of America has fallen under these temptations since this war has been going on! We have dishonored ourselves to get high prices for food and ammunition, and in selling weapons to kill men. Please let me know what you think God's Word teaches about war and preparedness. Can a Christian fight or kill under any circumstances?

M. R. will find the subject of the Christian attitude toward war treated in a former issue. Just now it is a theme which is uppermost in the minds of earnest people, who believe that the duty of the nation is to show an example of peace to the world, and that we would be sacrificing a great opportunity in following the example of the nations that rely on their huge armaments for peace and protection, when such a policy is certain to lead to war

J. W. B., Cedar Grove, N. J. If we ask sincerely for divine guidance in our affairs, it will be given. In every crisis of life it is wise to submit the matter in prayer, that we may be led to right action. You ask about two Christians differing on a question of right It may be that, through long consideration, the minds of both have become somewhat warped or prejudiced, and as it is difficult to remove opinions which have become convictions—honestly enough, no doubt, and yet more or less mistaken—why not submit the matter to some good friend as arbiter, who can take an unprejudiced view and help to solve the difficulty? We are all more or less disposed to be biased in our own interest and the counsel of one who is clear-headed and capable, and who can approach the matter with an open mind, is very likely to help toward a solution. One thing ought to be quite clear in the mind of a real Christian; that it is far better to suffer wrong than to do wrong.

"John M. D., Palestine, Texas. Thank you for your suggestion regarding cheaper paper for the publication. The point is this—that we buy what is called a 'book paper' and our order for 2,000 tons a year is considered a very good order for that quality of paper, and we buy it as cheaply as though we ordered ten times that quantity. Now the next grade in paper is such as is used by the daily papers, which does not permit of good illustrations also, it suffers considerably in handling in the mails. Our order of 2,000 tons yearly for newspaper would be so small as compared with what the daily papers use that the makers of this news print paper would care very little for the order and would not give us as low a price as they would to users of big quantities. We would have to pay almost as much for this inferior quality paper as for the paper that we are now using." [The above is a copy of a letter sent by the Christian Herald in reply to a friend's communication, and may prove informative to many other friends.]

Mrs. M. M., Dayton, Ohio. Please explain Deut 33 : 2 and Hab 3 : 3.

There is no contradiction here. In the passage in Deuteronomy it is written, "The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir"; in the passage in Habakkuk we read, "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran" Both passages refer to the place of his manifestation of himself to mankind in the giving of the law. "Teman" is the country south of Judea and near Edom in which latter country Mount Paran was situated. Paran is the desert region extending from the south of Judea to Sinai. Seir, Sinai and Paran are adjacent to one another.

J. B., Bucklin, Mo. 1. In what year did Paul write the epistle to the Philippians? 2. What does he mean by Phil. 3 : 11, 12, 13?

1. The apostle wrote (1 : 13) that his bonds in Christ are manifest to all the Prætorium, that is, the barracks of Cæsar's soldiers in Rome, and to the Philippians he sends greetings from "those of Cæsar's household." There is, therefore little doubt that the letter was sent from Rome, and its date was probably between A.D. 61 and 63. Whether it was near the beginning or end of his first imprisonment we cannot determine. 2. Briefly, the apostle here points out that even though his salvation be sure and certain, even he must forever strive, as does the contestant on the racecourse, to attain, lest he be a castaway. In other words, the apostle desires his readers to apprehend the seriousness of the Christian life with its ever-recurring pitfalls and obstructions that would make for falling by the wayside, but which is bound to end happily at the goal (verse 14) if, like Paul, we persist in the running and striving.

Mrs. C. M. O., Oxford, N. H. Please explain Matt. 21 : 28.

The parable of the two sons has this meaning: The first represents careless, reckless sinners resisting God to his face, with no thought of doing the Lord's bidding to work in and about his vineyard. The second represents the self-righteous, complacent hypocrite who says "I go," but never had even the intention of so doing. The first son repented of his disobedience, and him Jesus commends, as he does those sinners who, having heard John's and Christ's teachings, repented, and, abandoning their evil ways, started to work in the Lord's vineyard. But the second son was like the Pharisees, whom Jesus could not commend because, though they were early called and all their life long professed obedience to God, they never rendered it and their life was one continued disobedience.

Any reader knowing the present address of W. B. Dougherty, electric mechanic, last heard from in Troy, N. Y., will confer a favor by writing to Charles Dougherty, Louisiana, Mo.

A. M. C., Massachusetts. 1. Whenever we offend our conscience, we do well to throw the searchlight of investigation inward upon our own lives. If we do this, asking for divine guidance, we may find many things to surprise us. Thus, though one wrong us either with wicked intent or through selfishness or indifference, that does not justify us in repaying wrong with wrong, even though the act done in reprisal seems fairly and plausibly the exercise of a right. 2. We do not hold that any member of a family should wield such power as would persuade other members to forego religious privileges, even for a limited time, simply because he didn't want them to go or he didn't believe in it. God has the first claim upon all of us—a claim on our hearts for loving obedience and service—and he will not hold us guiltless if we give to another the right to dictate whether or not we should worship in the Lord's house and come before his altar.

H. S. B., Stryker, Ohio. The thirteenth chapter of Romans contains an injunction to Christians to submit themselves to temporal authorities. In doing so they are following the example of their Master, who said: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" (Matt. 22 : 21). The apostle enjoins such submission on the principle that the temporal forces are wisely instituted and ordained. Christ recognized this when he said that Pilate had no power over him except it were given him from above (John 19 : 11). The principle here discussed respects, however, the office only and not the character of the ruler and is binding on Christians only so long as it is in keeping with God's laws, and not when it requires of Christians acts or omissions contrary to God's word and command. The Christian's duty, therefore, is to obey the civil authorities in all things, so long as they do not require things against conscience and God's command.

A. O. J., Cozad, Neb. The question of family worship is one for the individual conscience. Morning or evening, either, is a good time, but better is morning and evening. Christians should feel the necessity both of beginning all with God and ending all with him, hence it is consistent that, as we ask for divine guidance at the day's beginning, we also praise and thank him for that guidance at its end. The presence of friends and neighbors at the time for family worship should not be allowed to interfere, but, on the contrary, "Let your light shine." Many a soul has been recalled, many a weary heart brought to Christ by "running into," as it were, an opportunity to hear the glad tidings of a Saviour's love.

IT is a far cry from the tin bath tub of a quarter-century ago to the bathroom of today. With all the modern improvements, however, the choice of one bathroom essential remains the same—that is Ivory Soap.

In thirty-seven years there has been no improvement upon Ivory Soap. It is impossible to make a better product. Finer materials cannot be procured. Greater skill and care in manufacturing cannot be used. Higher standards are not conceivable.

The qualities that attracted people to Ivory Soap in 1879 have held them ever since. That it is white, mild, pure and of pleasing natural odor, that it lathers copiously, rinses easily and floats, means that it offers every desirable feature for bath and toilet.

Today, as in 1879, there is but one Ivory as its millions of users know.

A Leader of the New Japan

Ninth Letter in the Series, Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

ron Ei Ichi Shibusawa

BARON SHIBUSAWA intends to devote the rest of his life to philanthropy, not by establishing almshouses and relief work, but by robbing industrial Japan of its ability to work injustice on the common people. No other man in Japan has so affected industrial and financial conditions in the last generation as the honest banker who is now retiring from the business of banking. If he is as successful in robbing Japanese life of injustice as he has been in infusing ntire business world with an example nquestioned honesty, he will be a ber baron" worthy of emulation.

e interpreter and I had waited he large reception room fitted upholstered furniture in the pean style, and with its g decorated with panels of y, wistaria, maple leaves a snow scene illustrating four seasons only long gh to become familiar with surroundings when the door ped and Baron Shibusawa red.

marveled at the small stature e man. I had expected to a large man, possibly as as myself. But any sense of lness was soon dispelled. Mans, rugged strength and dignity n that leonine head and those sad that would have given impressive- to Tom Thumb himself.

was immediately reminded of Ume- ni, one-time champion wrestler of n. Both faces show a type of ngth. Umegatani's shows the strength the over-developed athlete, proud is brawn, but with the crafty, shifty ce of the prizefighter. Baron Shibusawa's shows the strength of the man has fought his way to success, but has trodden on no one on the way: the man who, in his fight through difficulties to the top, has often stooped to aid another in the race. There is nothing shifty in his glance. His eyelids almost close over the deep-set eyes, but their look is as direct as the path of a sunbeam. Umegatani has preserved an almost womanly smoothness of heavy-featured jowl. Baron Shibusawa's face is furrowed with the burdens of a man whose heart feels with an all-embracing sympathy.

Acrobatic performers in fancy costumes? No. These are commonplace Japanese pile drivers at work st but not all Japanese factories are barred to the blic. In this one a photographer has caught young s dreaming dreams and reeling off raw silk from cocoons

Sitting there across the conference table, dressed in a black suit, and wearing a low, fold-over collar under the wings of which the ends of his black string tie were thrust, this man looked like some earnest Christian minister called to the vestry by important business. I almost wished that he had been clothed in the Japanese costume; yet it is possible that we were able to understand each other better as it was.

I asked the Baron something about his career. Willingly yet without pride he told of his humble beginning as a farmer's son, and his service under the Tokugaw Shoguns in the troublous days of their decline; of his visit to Europe in the last year before the Restoration, and the beginning of the Meiji era; of his service in the government as a high official in the Treasury Department, until the actions of the government forced him to resign for reasons of conscience.

A Statesman Philanthropist

EVEN then he had no dream of becoming the sage adviser of the princes of finance and business; but he found the merchant class disregarded by the nobility and the official class, and he set to work to win a place for the honest merchant in the life of the nation. It was not until he was sixty years old that his service to humanity was recognized by the Emperor, who created him Baron in the closing year of the last century. In the sixteen years since that date, he has seen the business and financial class rise to a place where money-bags talk to the government directly and with insistent voice. He has aided in the construction of a social system whose inevitable wrongs he is seeking to eradicate. Having raised his own class to an envied place, not only in every-day life but even at court, he is now seeking to aid the common people, upon whom the industrial revolution, without which Japan could not have risen to the rank of a first-class power, is working an injustice. His purpose is constructive philanthropy rather than tardy charity. Yet he has for many years practically supported the Tokyo Municipal Almshouse, in which, even in these "piping times" of prosperity through war, there are 2,700 inmates. In looking toward Utopia he is not ignoring the needs of the present, but is ministering to them.

Sign painter? No. Public letter writer? No. Printing his visiting card? No. He's a cloth dyer

He recognizes the need for divine aid in the alleviation of human suffering, and welcomes the efforts of Christian missionaries to add something vital to the life of the nation. Of all the men whom I have met, he suffers most deeply from the constant rumors of war between two friendly nations. He mentioned a letter from his friend, Morton Prince, who had written of the prevalence of war talk in America. The European war has brought spiritual sorrow to Baron Shibusawa. He had come to believe that international differences could be settled by mutual forbearance and moral appeal, and the cataclysm of the fateful summer of 1914 pricked him to the heart. Now he sorrows at the rumors of war which come from time to time from a nation upon whose friendship and sincerity Japan has long relied.

Mr. Zumoto, who has lived in America and who speaks English fluently, minimizes the effect of this idle gossip and common chatter. But Baron Shibusawa, whose three trips to America gave him an admiration for the democracy of the people, is pained deeply by the thought that even the uninformed can harbor

He is touching a god of disease to effect a cure of the corresponding part of himself. (If he doesn't catch the disease of the last toucher, the next one may catch his) hatred for his people. He believes in the honesty and judgment of Judge Gary, whose host he was in Tokyo, and hopes that thoughtful men are not against Japan; but he feels that it is criminal to arouse even the lowest classes of society to a feeling of unrest and hatred which, in a democracy, may lead to war.

With some hesitancy I asked two questions, to which I sought a reply:

"What is your personal suggestion for the solution of the question of Japanese immigration into America?" and "To what extent is it possible for America and Japan to cooperate in China?" I made it very plain that if he chose not to answer, no mention would be made that those questions had been asked. To my surprise, he answered at once. He sat forward in his chair and threw his whole self into the discussion.

"Those are exactly the questions I want to discuss. They are the most important questions at present complicating the relations between two nations whose friendship for more than half a century was traditional and real.

The Japanese Immigration Question Discussed

"IF our immigrants are not wanted, they will not be allowed to go. The 'gentleman's agreement' has been strictly observed. The Japanese will not force a welcome to a country which will not receive them. But in this matter, we grieve that the Japanese are not treated like the European immigrants. If extensive immigration is bad for America, she is, of course, free to close her doors. But it is discrimination between human beings and against the Japanese that we feel with sorrow and humility. However, that is a minor question. More immigrants are not going to America, and that question offers no difficulties.

"The real question is not whether more Japanese will be allowed to enter America, but whether those who are already there will be subjected to unjust discrimination. If they are not good citizens, we will furnish teachers who will train them as such. We will, at least, bring them up to the standard of the European immigrants. But the discrimination in California against those Japanese who have already founded homes there is a blot on Japan's honor as a race and as a nation."

The sad eyes seemed to look far back into the history in which he has taken an active part. Then he went on. "We have always been thankful for the service Commodore Perry rendered our nation. He has been almost a national hero with us, and until about ten years ago the American people observed the principle upon which he acted, and for which they stand in their own land—the principle of equality. When the change of attitude took place, the Japanese, who had come to rely upon the friendship and sincerity of the American nation, were very much embarrassed by a discrimination that not only wronged members of our race, but ran contrary to the principle of equality which we had so long considered an essential and vital part of American life and thought. Japan will follow to the letter every suggestion as to further immigration of my countrymen into your country: but until discrimination against those Japanese who are already living under the flag of equality and freedom is abolished, a cause for misunderstanding and ill-feeling will continue to exist."

A "Personal Opinion" Regarding China

"COOPERATION between America and Japan in China is not only possible but necessary," he continued. "America at present has the friendship of China, while Japan has her hatred. This gives America, which at present is seeking investment for its great wealth, a chance to reap a temporary advantage and to enter into strong competition with Japan. But this advantage to America is bound to be only temporary.

"Japan sees that she must win the friendship of China if she would reap lasting reward there. This will be done. I give this as the opinion of Baron Shibusawa." [This with his hand placed on his heart, to show that it was a personal opinion.]

"I am neither a politician nor am I in a position to give orders to the government; but I am free to admit that I think the fifth group of demands should not have been presented as they were. But friendship with China is bound to come.

"America," the Baron went on reflectively, "has machinery and highly trained men. She has money to invest, but she has no political ambitions and few soldiers in the Far East, and in the troubled state in which China must for some years inevitably find herself, who will protect American interests in that great land?

"Japan has neither the highest type of machinery, unlimited steel, nor the most efficient men; but she has many men of sufficient skill to carry out the plans of the American superintendents, and in case of disorder she has men who are trained and near at hand to protect the combined interests of America and Japan as well as of the other powers. The check on this armed force is the absolute necessity for preserving and fostering Chinese friendship. Americans do not comprehend how clearly the thinkers of Japan realize the need for friendly relations with our big neighbor."

In the midst of the whole question of the "open door" in China, I believe that Americans should hold to the idealism which prompted them, for the of China and largely from altruistic motives, to on the "open door" policy. I believe that An is the last bar to the partition of China. I tioned this hope that America, even at the ri war, should hold to this idealism, for which she i past has won respect, and asked this question

"Are Japan's actions in the future likely such that American idealism can support them

Baron Shibusawa answered at once and wi embarrassment.

"That is exactly the question that was aske by Mr. Vanderlip of the National City Bank of York, and my reply to you will be the same as i to him. American idealism and Japanese comm and economic necessity are the same, as far as is concerned. In a land grab, Japan would small benefit. The 'open door' must be mainta Americans can cooperate with Japan in the dev ment of China, with full assu that our interests in that n are identical.

"I do not entirely appro all that Japan has done, added, "but this is not en the fault of Japan. Durin last few months there ha been a stable governmen Peking. Outside interest China are interfering, not i interests of China but in thei There have been troublous and delicate situations; I America were in our place, she might be at a loss as t to act.

I asked Baron Shibusawa whether he had message to American readers which he would v teer.

Austria's Emperor Surrenders to Death

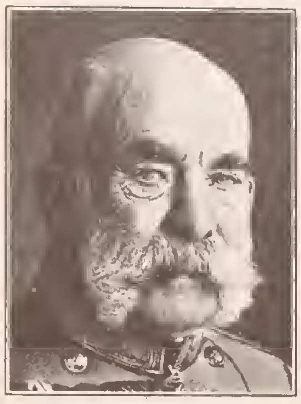
FRANCIS JOSEPH of Austria is dead. Had he lived until December 2 (he died November 21), he would have been sixty-eight years emperor of the most mixed of Old World empires, mpire that had no racial foundations, but was ted out of many small kingdoms, principalities and ies, related only geographically, and bound to- er only by the power of the sovereign and by common inability to stand alone. Austria began margravate which included Bohemia, Moravia Austria (see map) and indefinite ions of adjoining territory found- by Charlemagne as a defense nst the Avars. It became known esterreich or the eastern king- , Latinized as Austria, and ugh all the centuries until the defeat of the Turk before the s of Vienna in 1683, when John eski came to her help and saved day, Austria was the bulwark of pe against invasion from the .

he house of Hapsburg, from h came Francis Joseph, came to throne of Oesterreich in 1282 and e oldest reigning house in Europe. early years of the dynasty saw dy growth in the power and ter- y of the kingdom, which reached enith in 1519 under Charles V. n the rising power of Prussia lenged the dominance of Austria ng the German states, Austria porting the claims of Rome, Prussia fighting for estantism.

adly shattered by the Napoleonic wars, Austria vered slowly during the Thirty Years' War under guiding hand of the master statesman Metternich, died in 1848. But returning strength brought weakness, the old weakness of clashing racial rests which had marked the kingdom from its in- ion, and Ferdinand, faced with threatened revolt ungary, Bohemia and Italy, abdicated the throne. eighteen-year-old nephew, Francis Joseph, suc- led to the crown and to the problems of the empire.

was a shadowy scepter that was laced in the hands of the new sov- gn, but Francis Joseph moved tly, defeated with the aid of Rus- the Hungarians under Kossuth, away their constitution and gov- d them as an absolute monarch il 1867, when he was crowned at la-Pesth with the historic crown of Stephen and restored complete onomy to Hungary. Singular as it seem, this same Hungary which been seething with revolt against tyranny of the Austrian emperor epted this same emperor as its own and gave him loyal and unfeigned giance until his death.

orced by revolution and intrigue protect his throne at all hazards, influenced by reactionary advisers, ncis Joseph early in his reign abol- d all constitutional guaranties oughout his empire and became a itary despot, being brought back to w view of the rights of his subjects self-expression and a voice in their ernment only by an attempt upon life made in 1853 during a review the army. This incident brought young emperor to a realization that there must be something wrong in the kingdom, and he gradually became more liberal, a tendency that was accentuated by his marriage to Elizabeth of Bavaria in 1854. He restored Austria's constitution in 1860. He was in 1854 sovereign of Lombardy and Venetia in Italy, of the Tyrol, Dalmatia, Bohemia, Carinthia, Silesia, Galicia, Bukowina, Hungary, Croatia and Transylvania, and was at the zenith of his power.



The late Emperor Francis Joseph

Emperor of Austria-Hungary, Charles Francis Joseph (Charles I), and his Empress

In 1859 the smoldering revolution in Italy came to a head under the king of Sardinia, who, supported by Napoleon III, raised the cry of "United Italy"—which has again arisen in the present war. Francis Joseph was defeated and was forced to grant freedom to Lombardy. In 1864 he supported Prussia in the military enterprise in which Schleswig and Holstein were severed from Denmark, only to have Bismarck turn upon him in 1866 in a six weeks' war, which was ended by the disastrous battle of Königgratz, in which the ascendency of Prussia among the Germanic peoples was definitely established.

Austria turned eastward, and, from being a buffer state holding back the Turk, became a militant state, driving him back with her eye upon the Bosphorus and the Ægean Sea. But Austria was not alone in her hatred of the Turk or designs upon his territory. Russia also looked toward the Bosphorus, and the friendship and frequent alliances of Austria and Russia practically ended in 1878, when the clearing away of the Russo-Turkish war at the Congress of Berlin bared the claws of the bear, broke the alliance that had existed between Russia, Prussia and Austria, cemented the alliance between Austria and Prussia, which with the accession of Italy in 1882 became the Triple Alliance, and planted some of the seeds of the present cataclysm of strife in Europe. This same Congress of Berlin charged Austria with the administration of the Turkish provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, although the sovereignty remained in Turkey, and created in the Balkan States of Serbia, Bulgaria and Rumania a bar to the eastward-tending aspirations of Austria, beginning the Balkan question, which agitated Europe until it precipitated actual conflict in the two Balkan wars.

In 1908 Francis Joseph stepped to the verge of war when he annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina to his empire.

Francis Joseph died the idol of his people. He spoke fluently the language of each racial group he governed, and there are seventeen of them. He was accessible, in his later years democratic, and his personality through many years was almost the sole binding force within his empire. On the personal side, his life, stormy enough politically, was marked by tragedy. First his nephew, the ill-starred Maximilian of Mexico, was assassinated; then in 1887 came the probable suicide of his son and only heir, Prince Rudolph. Another nephew, the Archduke Johann, disappeared on a voyage to Chile; his sister-in-law died in a bazaar fire in Paris; and in 1898 his wife, the Empress Elizabeth, was murdered at Geneva. The crowning tragedy came in June, 1914, at Sarajevo in Bosnia, when Serbian plotters murdered the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his consort, and lit the war flame which is blazing today across swamp and steppe and plain and mountain from Flanders to Mesopotamia, in Africa and at sea.

The new emperor, the Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, born August 17, 1887, is a grandnephew of Francis Joseph, son of a brother of the murdered Ferdinand. He has lived quietly, is a student, a good linguist, and popular with the people of the empire. His education along military lines had been complete as befitted a member of the royal family, and as a general in the field he had been nominally in command on the Rumanian front whence he was summoned to Vienna by his succession to the throne. The new empress was the Princess Zita of Parma, in Italy.

While there is much speculation as to the probable effect of this change of sovereigns upon the course of the war, news dispatches and the guarded expressions of authorities intimate that it will have little immediate influence.

How Nebraska Went Dry

NEBRASKA is dry. The prohibition amendment to the State Constitution was carried by over 00 at the recent election. "Praise d from whom all blessings flow." braska has contributed her share ard "winning the West."

ednesday morning the customary eting in Omaha and through the te was, "Well, we're dry"; "We are owing up our hats this morning"; ho would have guessed it?" "Ne- ska never does things by halves." every town and village jubilee meet- s are the order of the day. In every rch thanksgiving prayers "are ap- nted to be said" by the spontaneous ire of the people.

The victory was the result of splendid anization, untiring effort, and a npaign of speaking and advertising, kept up till the last minute. As the te has only one large city, the activities in Hastings, a typical Western town of about 12,000, with its college, its brewery, churches, fourteen saloons, and several factories, practically tell the story of what was done through the whole state.

Beginning several weeks previous to the election, the local Church Federation Council, increased by a number of other representative men, and headed by one of the livest business men of the city, met every other Monday evening at the Young Men's Christian Association, took lunch together, and then in an hour's meeting heard reports on the progress already made, and laid out the future plan of campaign. Not only the ministers, but lawyers, merchants, and real estate men gave their time freely for speeches, meetings, and rallies in adjoining towns. Automobiles driven by consecrated gasoline traveled back and forth like shuttles weaving a shroud for the liquor traffic. Trenchant advertisements were run nightly in the local paper and paid for in hard cash. The paper made no concession, for it has long been frankly "wet." Squadrons of students went out from the college to adjoining towns to talk and sing, in breezy college-student style, the temperance message. The ministers, Sunday after Sunday, preached in their own pulpits the Gospel of prohibition as furthering the promised kingdom of God. Later they exchanged all around and preached the same message. Posters in flaring colors trumpeted the message on street corners, and the poster wagon daily paraded the streets proclaiming its silent red-letter story.

November 6 the entire county was combed with a fine-toothed comb. It had been divided into forty districts, to each of which had been assigned two or four workers. These men covered their district in automobiles, buttonholing every voter in the county outside of the towns. They prodded the indifferent, urged on the doubtful, got out the stay-at-homes, and in many instances actually brought men from the wet column into the dry. One German who had fully intended to vote

Forming for Labor Battle. With the formation of the great organization of employers noted in last week's Christian Herald came the announcement that this organization would support the railroads in the concerted attack which they are making upon the Adamson Eight-Hour Law On the other side, within the week, the four railway brotherhoods have been found joining forces with the American Federation of Labor, an association from which they have held aloof in the past, making common cause in support of recent legislation favorable to labor. Because a statute of the United States is being attacked by the injunction suits filed by the railroads, the labor leaders will have the benefit of the best counsel available, directed by the United States Attorney General's office, in the defense of the Adamson Act. It is significant also that the Executive Committee of the American Federation of Labor meeting at Baltimore on November 20 favored the absolute disregard of all court decisions or injunctions "based on the dictum that 'labor is property.'" It is possible that we are to see a fight in the court between organized capital (the railway and industrial corporations concerned in this action, employing between six and seven million men) and organized labor (representing 2,000,000 Federation members and 400,000 members of the brotherhoods), a fight which may overflow into the field of industry. Judge Hook of the Federal District Court of Kansas City, Mo., at the urgent request of the United States Attorney rendered a decision in one of the railway injunction suits. Declaring his action taken merely to get the question before the Supreme Court, the Judge held the Adamson Law unconstitutional and directed the attorneys for both sides to perfect an appeal at once.

Girl Makes Record Flight. Miss Ruth Law, flying an obsolete type of Curtiss biplane two years old, broke the American non-stop record on November 19, flying from Grant Park, Chicago, to Hornell, N. Y., a distance of 590 miles, breaking the record made by Victor Carlstrom on November 2 in the most modern flying machine obtainable. She would have made greater distance, but was forced to descend for lack of fuel. Miss Law left Chicago at 8:25 A. M. and landed at Hornell at 2:10 P. M., leaving there at 3:24 P. M., and flying to Binghamton, N. Y., in 56 minutes, the distance being ninety miles. She spent the night at Binghamton and completed the trip to New York on the morning of the 20th. Her time for the 884 miles was 8 hours 55 minutes and 35 seconds. She made the longest flight ever made by a woman, and broke the best record by a man for a non-stop flight. The previous record for continuous flight by a woman was made by Mlle. Dutrieux in 1912 at Paris, the flight being 200 miles. Miss Law is the sister of Rodman Law, who is well known in aviation, and is herself an experienced aviatrix, although she had never before attempted such a long-continued flight.

Remorseless Competition. Louis W. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railroad, on November 17 confirmed the report that the railroads of the Northwest were organizing a big telegraph company to take over the business which they are now giving the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Companies. The new company will use the railroad-owned poles and lines now leased to the Western Union, taking them over as fast as the leases expire, beginning January 1, 1917, and additional lines will be built. The company is to handle railway business only on a basis of actual cost. About 48,000 miles of wire will be controlled, and it will be necessary for the commercial companies to string new wires and in many cases to instal new commercial stations in smaller towns, where the railway agents have also been the agents of the telegraph companies.

Damages for Non-Delivery. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals on November 18 reversed the finding of the United States District Court, and declared the National City Bank and the Guaranty Trust Company entitled to recover damages from the North German Lloyd Steamship Company for the non-delivery of gold shipped on the steamship Kronprinzessin Cecilie, which turned back and ran for an American port just before the declaration of war between Germany and England. The case was sent back to the District Court for determination of amount of damages due, and it is expected that it will be appealed to the Supreme Court or final decision.

On the same day, increased wage announcements were given out by the American Woolen Company and by the Cotton Manufacturers' Association of New Bedford, and wage increases were announced by other cotton mills in New England. On the following day the Consolidated Gas Company of New York City and the New York Edison Company paid to their employees a dividend of seven per cent. on their salaries, this being the same rate at which dividends are paid to stockholders. The movement for the increasing of wages in recognition of the mounting cost of living is showing signs of becoming nation-wide.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

IN an apparently inspired interview, Lord Derby gave his views on the subject of peace during the week, and defined the attitude of the Entente Allies, saying, "Any peace proposals from Germany will receive the consideration they deserve. The Allies have not modified their position in this respect." As to the probable duration of the war, Lord Derby said, "Only a fool would prophesy. I believe any one who understands the temper of the British people will agree with me that they have shown no signs of weakening, but, on the contrary, are growing more determined to continue the war to a satisfactory conclusion." On the other hand, the Germans appear equally determined.

Many other men of equal political importance in the various belligerent countries have discussed peace in more or less extended fashion in the past few weeks. The importance of these pronouncements lies not so much in what is said as in the fact that responsible leaders are willing to discuss the subject at all.

It is becoming reasonably clear that neither set of belligerents can fully accomplish those objects which they set out to accomplish in this war; and if this is true this war must end, as so many wars have ended before it, in a compromise of some character. The main task now appears to be to find a fitting political formula wherein this compromise can be expressed in such terms that the mass of the population in both sets of belligerents will have the conviction that they have achieved the most important ends which they sought to win. This difficult task has been accomplished before in the world's history, and will probably be achieved in the present case. The writer clings to the idea, already expressed in these columns, that the president of Switzerland or the king of Spain will ultimately be the interventor when the time for an armistice comes.

The financial situation of the two groups of combatants, considered as a whole, is by no means acute—nothing so acute as was that of the United States, for instance, during the last two years of the civil war; and it is extremely probable that, as far as finance goes, the powers involved could carry on the war for another eighteen months before this phase of the conflict would become controlling.

The economical situation, particularly as regards foodstuffs and coal, is, however, in some of the nations at war, growing acute to the extent that considerable inconvenience and discomfort is being felt by the civilian population; but conditions have by no means as yet become unbearable. France has adopted during the past week the rule of having two meatless days each week, and others of the belligerent nations, England especially, have adopted other measures of food conservation more stringent than those heretofore in force. All of which things will have more or less effect in disposing the popular mind in the several countries toward political reasonableness, and thus aid the campaign of peace education.

EXCEPT in Rumania and on the Macedonian fronts, the fighting of the past week has been neither interesting nor important. On the western front in the Picardy sector on Friday, November 17, the much-fought-over village of Pressoire, south of the Somme, again changed hands during the night, and once more passed into the possession of the French; and thus the lines on this portion of that front reverted to their former position.

North of the Somme, the British, on that portion of their front north of the Ancre, made two attacks, one toward Grandcourt and the other a little farther north in the direction of Mailly-Serre, both of which the Germans repulsed. Except for artillery activity at points, the rest of this Picardy front was calm, as was all the rest of the western front. The next day and Sunday the rival artilleries were active on both sides of the Ancre and at St. Pierre Vaast wood. Nothing took place on Monday. Tuesday the German infantry drove the British out of Grandcourt, and the next day the only infantry activity was around Sailly-Saillisel on the French portion of the front.

The Austro-Italian front can be very rapidly disposed of. The Austrians during the week won a trench or two on the Carso front, and elsewhere there was nothing but intermittent and resultless artillery duels.

In a leading editorial the semi-official Dagblatt of Stockholm on Tuesday of this week warned Norway against a policy of adventure, and stated that Sweden is not prepared to follow Norway in any such policy.

The Allies made quite an extensive raid on the Belgian coast Wednesday, attacking Zeebrugge and Ostend.

LATE advices indicate that Great Britain is in a bit of a panic on the submarine question. It is reported that Robert Houston of Liverpool has offered a reward of $10,000 for each submarine sunk between now and the end of next May. In addition, the press is said to be demanding the scalp (official of course) of Mr. Balfour, head of the navy, and the inauguration of a more vigorous use of Britain's naval forces; in short, a putting in practice of Churchill's "dig-the-rats-out" policy.

The Germans report that the Central Identification Office at Kiev, Russia, has issued a list of Russian casualties since June 1, 1916, which contains the names of 100,621 officers and 2,027,853 men; and also that the late lists show that a portion of the Russian troops on the Caucasian front have been brought to the Russian front in Europe. This would not be done unless Russia was very short of trained men.

The largest steamer in the world, the White Star liner Britannic, 48,000 tons, being used as a hospital ship in the Mediterranean, was sunk late in the week, presumably by a mine. About twenty-five perished.

Dr. Gottlieb von Jagow, the German minister of foreign affairs, has resigned. His probable successor is Alfred Zimmermann, the under-secretary.

Greece has been in hot water most of the week. In addition to the demand made by the Allies for the surrender of all the military equipment and munitions of all kinds in the possession of the Greek government, the demand was also made that the diplomatic representatives of the Teutonic powers and their allies leave the kingdom forthwith. To the demand for the surrender of the military equipment and munitions the Greek government refused to comply, according to the cables, in the following terms: "The Greek government has refused the demands of Vice-Admiral du Fournet that Greece surrender eighteen field batteries, sixteen batteries of mountain artillery with 1,000 shells for each, 40,000 Männlichers, with 200 cartridges. Referring to Admiral de Fournet's contention that the cession of war material to the Bulgarians and Germans had disturbed the equilibrium, the government replies that, although it does not desire to enter into the details of that operation, it must point out that the cabinet then in power could not approve of resistance to the Central Powers without abandoning neutrality, but duly protested." As a result of this refusal, French marines have taken possession of some of the railroad stations in Athens.

There are now employed on the railways in Germany, in place of men, in various positions, some 35,000 women; in France, about 32,000.

In Rumania, with the capture of Craiova by the Teutons, which was officially announced to have taken place at noon of November 21, the military situation becomes considerably clearer. It appears now as certain as any unhappened event can be that the portion of the Rumanian army operating to the west of Craiova, and which, by the capture of that town, was cut off from any method of communication with the main body of the army to the east of Craiova, will either be forced to surrender or will be cut to pieces.

This army now is practically encircled by the enemy, at Orsova to the west, at Vidin to the south, and at Craiova to the east, so that its escape seems improbable, particularly as before long its supplies must fail. For this latter reason very probably the Teutons will not waste lives by attacking it violently, but, while maintaining their commanding positions in regard to it, let time accomplish a comparatively bloodless result.

Presumably the next point against which the Teutons in Little Wallachia will direct their major effort will be the town of Slatina, on the railroad about thirty miles to the east of Craiova. This town is important as a railroad center, not only because actually located on the Orsova-Bucharest Railroad, but also for being practically at the point where the north-and-south railroad, running from Hermaunstadt in Transylvania through the Red Tower pass to Corabia on the Danube, intersects the first-mentioned line.

This place is also on the Alt River, and commands the entrance to the valley of the same name, which runs north to the Red Tower pass, south of which a Teutonic force stands on Rumanian soil. Consequently, while Slatina is occupied, the Rumanians opposing this force will also have the enemy in their rear, which will inevitably force a retreat of this Rumanian force through a difficult country to the eastward.

It is worth while noting, for future reference, the fact that, once the Rumanians and Russians are driven by the Teutonic forces now to the west of them into Moldavia, or even to the east of Bucharest, these Teutons will be able to take contact with the forces of von Mackensen in the Dobrudja and thus form a line running northwest to southeast from the frontier of Transylvania to the Black Sea, from which line Odessa would not be an untraversable distance, but comparatively little farther in fact, over an easy country, than Monastir is from Nish over a difficult, broken country.

On November 19 the allied troops entered Monastir, which became the temporary capital of Serbia. Aviation corps figured in the capture. Severe weather with storms failed to stop the fighting the days before.

The President's Problems

NOW that the election is a thing of the past, the President, who laid aside the important cares of state for a brief season, has again taken up the lines, and means to give attention to the pressing problems that await him. And these are not few. There are, first, the Mexican Commission, which is sadly out of joint and liable to go to pieces; the submarine problem, which calls for a better understanding; the inexcusable interference and delay to American shipping and the censorship and violation of American mails. It may be found advisable to adopt the retaliatory measure of withholding clearances from the vessels of those powers that are causing us such vexatious trouble and loss. Then, hanging over the whole country like a great depressing shadow, there is the very serious question of domestic food prices, which are steadily mounting, inflicting widespread suffering and creating a situation which could be instantly relieved by placing an embargo on the export of breadstuffs. This, we learn from Washington dispatches, is a measure to which the President and a certain element in Congress would object; but the fact remains that something must be done to check the abnormal cost of living, and the only rational way of doing it is by prohibiting the selfish speculative interests from sending the greater part of the food out of the country. A number of business organizations, municipalities and official boards have strongly urged this duty upon the President, who has it in his power to afford relief to the millions who are now suffering here at home. Many remedies have been suggested, including Federal or State regulation of food prices, or both; and the Australian system which prevents arbitrary fluctuations has been recommended. But there are already too many ineffective laws lumbering our statute books. The trouble is, the nation's supply is diverted from the tables of the people to the war camps of Europe, and the direct, swift and sure remedy is to stop sending food out of the country to the fighting nations, in order that our own home needs may be supplied. This does not mean an embargo affecting the gifts of American benevolence to non-combatants. It would, however, put an end to the feeding of foreign armies and navies, thus keeping up the war while inflicting needless hardships on our own people at home.

This serious question now confronts the Administration. Congress has already put it within the power of the President to take any step that may be necessary in such an emergency, and the vast majority of Americans are now looking to him for the relief which they have the right to expect. Bread and bullets are permitted to be sent across the ocean in an endless chain of cargoes. If we stop sending them, it would not only help to shorten the war, but it would be doing a service to our own people which would be universally appreciated.

Austria's New Ruler

AFTER the longest reign in modern history, the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary has passed away at the age of eighty-six. His life was full of vicissitudes, and many times it was darkened with sorrow. He came into the world in the midst of a revolution, ascended the throne during a still greater revolution, and passed away at the height of the greatest war of all the ages. Probably no monarch in Europe has been more discussed and criticized; but the fact that he kept together, through many stormy crises, a great empire in which many races and nationalities were represented is the best testimony to his ability as a ruler. As the years passed on, he became more and more popular among his people. He was their servant as well as their emperor; he mixed among them freely and worked tirelessly at the endless tasks that make the occupant of a throne as much of a toiler as any captain of industry could possibly be. It has often been said that he was the hardest-worked man in the empire, and he died in the official harness. He had succeeded, as few rulers could have done, in keeping the various racial and political elements together, although dismemberment had frequently been predicted. And he transmitted to his successor an unbroken empire.

His grandnephew Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, the new emperor, is a young man still under thirty, and while personally very popular with all classes, he has little experience in affairs of state. He had been an active participant in the war until within a few days before the death of the aged emperor summoned him to rule. His accession takes place at a time of great trial, in which his strength of character and governing abilities will be severely tested. Even amid the crash of war, the sympathy of Europe and the world will go out to the youth who takes the helm of affairs, with the hope that he may be wisely guided, and that Europe during his reign may soon begin to realize the blessings of peace.

For a Sober New Year's Eve

NEW Year's Eve is an institution. We hail it with exultant shouts and fight off sleep an hour or two beyond our usual wont, in order to see the New Year arrive, although the inaccuracy of a single clock may let it slip in unannounced. Various expedients have been worked out to enable us to keep awake and reasonably happy, while the lingering moments of the old year wear themselves away. We arrange watch-night parties at our homes, we hold watch meetings in our churches, and a few—a dwindling number, we are glad to say—celebrate the death of the old year and the birth of the new in dinner parties that tend much towards liquids, and gladden the till of the restaurateur in inverse proportion to the sobriety of the diners. Some of these celebrations in other years have been disgusting orgies of bacchanalian excess. Now, it happens that New Year's falls on Monday, and New Year's Eve, per se, on Sunday. Excise laws frown upon Sunday liquor-selling, and the chief executives of New York, Chicago and other cities have refused to grant the usual all-night licenses. A wail has gone up from the venders of alcohol and from a few of their intended patrons; but at this writing the mayors, supported by protests from the churches and by the clear intent of the law, have not yielded. The latest proposition of those who would glean the profits of debauchery is that New Year's Day be officially postponed one day, and the usual observances permitted on Monday evening; but this foolish suggestion has not gone far. It really looks as if, for once, the watch meeting would have the right of way; as if the New Year sunrise would dawn upon a world almost unanimously sober. Perhaps the celebrants will realize, in the strength of a sober morning, the utter folly of the old bibulous welcome. At any rate they will have a foretaste of the day that is soon to be, when the lobster palaces and the Great White Way will no longer hear the clink of glasses or the garish laughter, the coarse jokes and the ribald merriment of the intoxicated.

Preparedness and Opportunity

IN the heat of our wrangling on the complex question of preparedness, let us pause to reflect upon the vital fact that there is one form of preparedness in which America stands supreme.

It is in preparedness to extend to stricken Europe the hand of a strong brother, to shelter the homeless, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to care for the dying, to provide for the crippled and for the widows and orphans.

It is in preparedness for war—if that familiar phrase sounds better—but for aggressive and righteous war against the misunderstandings and hatreds, the woes and wrongs, the poverty and despair that have palsied half the world—a war in which no nation can be our enemy, but all must be our allies.

A suggestion made some time ago in the Christian Herald has been taken up in vigorous spirit by the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, former ambassador to France.

"The situation," said Mr. Herrick in a recent address, "can be adequately met only by the systematic organization of all the philanthropic force of the United States. A strong central authority is needed, such as the government alone can give. I wish that the President had seen fit (and it is not yet too late) to appoint a large number of the leading men of the country as a committee to take charge of the whole undertaking—to coordinate all kinds of relief work, receiving the aid of Federal and state governments even to the extent of appropriations. Were we to set the mark at a billion dollars, that would be little enough to meet the extraordinary demands of this worst calamity that the world has ever known."

It is a big idea, but no bigger than the possibilities. America is fully prepared, as to means, to meet the greatest opportunity any nation has ever had for world service.

Here stands the greatest republic that history records, founded on the highest political and sociological ideals that mankind has conceived; at peace with the world and complacent within itself, with its granaries full to overflowing and its manufactories humming with production day and night, with profits so large that economic history hardly knows their parallel—profits which to a great extent have come direct from the demands and needs of distra ed Europe.

Yet the fact remains that, out of this inflo ng wealth, the contributions of Americans to all Euro an sufferers do not reach $35,000,000. While ar drained England and France were finding $240,00 00 for Belgian relief, peaceful and prosperous Am ca squeezed out $12,000,000.

The secretary of the Permanent Blind Relief a Fund recently reported that "after six month o hard, unremitting toil in the United States we ve collected a paltry $225,000." Paderewski rep ed $60,000 as the proceeds of a series of musical r formances in New York and Chicago, "whereas a single performance given by Melba in Melbo ne $70,000 was gathered."

But these are not our own people, some may y. They are our own people. They have sent their st blood and brain and brawn to our melting-pot, nd to their sons and daughters, now of us, our ascend cy is due more largely than can be computed. Am ca proclaims no higher ideal than that all mankind brotherhood.

Of what avail in the great scheme of life are b n- teous wealth and strength if not lent to brothe in distress? If these are of God, they must be for d, if they are not of God, and for God, then the gr our wealth, the poorer we are, and the greater m strength, the weaker.

With boundless prosperity come boundless resp bilities. Out of the greatest of world disasters t have come to us the greatest of world opportuniti

Through humanity's awful travail of today a spirit of world brotherhood may be born for all t e.

If rich and powerful America will rise to its op r- tunity, it will demonstrate to the world that ur loudly-proclaimed ideals can be translated into rea y. "The truth is what will work," and it is onl y making our principles fit into this world emerg y that we can gain for them world-acceptance.

If, in this crisis, we can coin our ideals into y fulfilled, we shall overcome the world's distrust us for our mere commercialism, and command its adn a- tion and win its love. If we shut our ears against e clear call, close our eyes against the opportunity d lock our coffers against the need, we shall deserve e contempt of all the nations and of our children and ir children's children.

To give is to grow; to withhold in selfishness to decay. Not only is the fate of Europe in the bala the fate of America is in the balance, too. There tests as decisive as war, and we confront the stric t.

His Last Run

MOST traveling men and thousands of ot know the Gideons, that organization w has shown wonderful energy in spreading e Gospel of Jesus Christ among commercial men. e Gideons have a method in their spiritual work. is not haphazard, and it brings good results. Mar a life, well nigh wrecked on the shoals of sinful in l- gence and evil associations, has been rescued d rehabilitated through Gideon influences.

James M. Davis, president of the organizat n, sends this incident, which the Christian Herald pri s:

> In the United States mail service, when the men arrive f m their runs, they are "checked out," and a note made of w they have gone. For twenty years there ran from Kansas to Denver, Colo., a mail clerk. His home was to him the charmed spot—no other place possessed such attracti s, nothing could allure him from it. This mail-carrier w a devout Christian, to whom the church relation meant r than nominal membership. It meant willing service, a render of time, talents, money, all; and it brought him, t will to any one, large returns.

Loving friends were there to pay a last trib , to tell of his love of home, his duty well performed, and to l l his clean, virtuous life. Flowers were profuse, and his cas t was literally covered, when his associates in the railr d service came bearing an offering of white roses, across the f of which this line stood boldly out, so all could read: "Chec d out; gone home."

There is a whole Gospel sermon in these few s tences, which might well be commended as a model many ministers and evangelists. And not the least its merits is that it can be applied to any one, man woman, no matter what may be the vocation in l

rconi Wireless Spans Pacific

THE opening of the Marconi wireless trans-Pacific commercial service was a message sent - by President Wilson from San cisco to the Emperor of Japan ember 15. It was a prayer for ersal peace and was as follows: e government and people of the ed States of America send greetings our Imperial Majesty and to the le of Japan and rejoice in this nph of science, which enables the e of America, from the Far West. ross the silent spaces of the world speak to Japan in the Far East, ng the dawn of a new day. May wonderful event confirm the un- en friendship of our two nations give assurance of a never-ending change of messages of good will. the day soon come when the voice eace, carried by these silent mes- ers, shall go into all the world and ords to the end of the world." The ado sent back an appropriate reply. God answer the prayer of the wireless across the Pacific, or eful ocean, for a lasting and uni- al peace, when this prophecy shall fulfilled: "They shall beat their ds into plow-shares, and their spears pruning hooks: nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall learn war any more." (Micah 4 : 3.)

ord's Advice to Brewers

MICHIGAN has voted for state-wide prohibition, but the brewing nts in the state need not be aban- ed," said Henry Ford the other day. illions of dollars are invested in se plants. Economically it would shameful waste to have them be- e idle. But there is no reason why should become so. Every stand- brewing plant anywhere can be nsformed at an expense that is in no se prohibitive from a brewery into a illery for manufacturing denatured hol for use in automobiles or er internal combustion engines. And n," Mr. Ford continued very earn- y, "with the world's supply of roleum, and therefore of gasolene, playing out and the day of alcohol for automobiles and tractors just ning, the present brewery proper- are assured a future much more ful to the community and quite as fitable to themselves as has been ir past." Mr. Ford declared that the ater part of the brewing apparatus machinery in any brewery can be d in making alcohol, the addition ded only being a continuous still. he raw materials we have used in laboratories in producing alcohol aply are various kinds of grains and getable substances. Tests were made h corn and wheat. Then we tried tatoes, grapes, cherries, peaches, cur- its, strawberries and many other ids of small fruits. Carrots, turnips, ets, sugar cane and wood were also d. We also found that the wastes m canneries, such as apple peels and rry pits; the wastes from sugar fac- ies and vegetable tops, usually own away on the farms, were sur- singly high in alcohol value.

"One of the best materials we found re cornstalks. These, ground up, shed and boiled, produced a very h percentage. An acre of cornstalks ll produce 100 gallons of alcohol. me cornstalks would produce 50 per nt. more. Then the distiller can turn ound and sell his waste back to the mer for cattle food. Nothing has en taken from it but the alcohol; all e nitrogenous matter is still there to back to the soil as fertilizer." Many brewers and distillers are sick and tired of their business, and would gladly get out of it if they could without too great financial loss. In the dry states they are turning their establishments into the manufacture of soft drinks, ice cream, denatured alcohol and other products. Mr. Ford's advice to the liquor manufacturers is but the echo of this voice of the prophet: "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well." (Isa. 1 : 16, 17.)

Milwaukee's Woman Dog-catcher

MISS LENORE CAWKER, Milwaukee's official dog-catcher, is a millionaire. It is quite evident that she did not take the job for the money there is in it. Ten years ago Milwaukee had a dog pound, but the conditions under which it was operated were nauseating. When Miss Cawker heard of this, she started a movement for more humane treatment of dogs and cats and other animals. Unofficially, she has been Milwaukee's dog-catcher since that time, and it was only last year that she received her official commission. It costs approximately $3,000 a year to run the department as Miss Cawker wishes it run, and the difference between this sum and her salary she pays out of her own pocket. She estimates that she has spent more than $30,000 on the work in the last ten years. Miss Cawker has fitted up a part of her stables as a kennel, with an asphyxiation room in which she guarantees painless death to dogs and cats that must be disposed of. In this kennel there are usually from twenty to fifty dogs and cats awaiting identification by owners or the alternative, asphyxiation. The dogs of pedigree, or pure blood, are saved whenever a real owner can be found for them, while the mongrels are asphyxiated after the shortest time in which they might be claimed. Last year Miss Cawker and her men handled 3,000 dogs alone, and the best testimonial to the efficiency of her department is the fact that Milwaukee has had no serious hydrophobia and comparatively few cases of stray dog nuisances since she took charge of it. The Jews had contempt for dogs, and looked on them somewhat as moderns do on the poor mongrel curs that for the good of society have to be chloroformed. Their contempt is employed by the apostle Paul in this figure: "Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers." (Phil. 3 : 2.)

Evolution of the Prairie

THE prairie until about 1850 was little known and less understood by American authors, who for the most part were men of the Atlantic seaboard, who had seldom if ever passed the Alleghanies. Longfellow, Lowell and Whittier knew the old West only by hearsay. Only Irving and one or two other prominent literary men had some personal knowledge of it. The men of the West were too busy taming the wilderness to write romance or poetry about the new home of literature. To the literary people of the country the prairie was the great American desert. The settler without capital took the treeless prairies in hand because they were cheap and treeless land, and found that they would grow grass and grain. The railroads came and brought them fuel and a market for their crops. The dugout or hut of cottonwood slabs gave way to the square pine house of one story, and then a house like the one they had left in the East; and now has come the home of fine architecture and interior decoration and lovely grounds. Those vast, monotonous, marshy districts have been transmuted into a veritable garden. The social evolution of the prairie has been as marked as its material progress. It is an empire of hardy, intelligent, industrious, thrifty and virtuous people, who fear God and love men, who want the school and church, but who will not tolerate the saloon. Westward the star of empire takes its flight, and of the American prairies and of these valued pioneers it may truly be said in words of Scripture: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. "(Isa. 35 : 1.)

Dynamite Removes Tree-Tops

INSTEAD of using an ax in removing the tops of trees desired for ship-masts, some logging districts are using dynamite to blow them off. The lumberman climbs the tree to the place where it is to be severed, wraps sticks of dynamite fastened together like links of sausage, withdraws to a safe distance, touches the fuse, and blows the top into kindling wood. There is this mention of going to the dense forest to get trees for ship-masts: "They have made all thy ship boards of fir trees of Senir; they have taken cedars from Lebanon to make masts for thee." (Ezek. 27 : 5.)

Shooting Stars Appeared

THE Leonid meteors crossed the orbit of the earth just after midnight on the morning of November 16. When the orbit of these meteors hit the earth's atmosphere some of the meteors were burned up by friction and appeared as shooting stars. The shower was very conspicuous in 1799, 1833 and 1867. Many who sat up all night November 16 to see the balls of fire shot into space were disappointed, as the fog was so heavy that it largely obscured the display. The ancients did not know much about astronomy, though they did know something. The Greeks gave to the stars the names of their mythological heroes, and the English Bible has copied them bodily in translating the words of the Hebrew poet who hailed Jehovah as the Creator, "Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south." (Job. 9 : 9.)

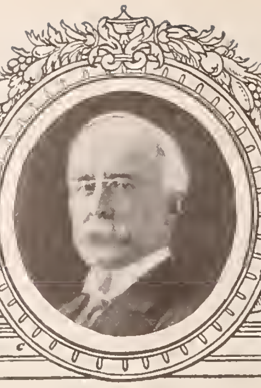
Nearly $3,000,000 for Misssons

AT the meeting of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church just held in New York, the treasurer, Rev. Dr. Fowles, reported a total of receipts for the year at $2,967,026, the largest in the history of the denomination. The amount was made up of $1,255,800 church collections, $1,033,770 contributed by the women, and $677,447 in special gifts. The amounts distributed to foreign fields were, to China, $185,350; Japan, $67,561; Malaysia, $55,000; Africa, $45,435; South America, $104,860; Mexico, $60,900, and Europe and North Africa, $184,173. Universal Christianity will rejoice at this splendid showing. It does not seem long ago that the clarion voice of Chaplain McCabe sounded the demand for the seemingly impossible $1,000,000 for missions last year by the Methodist Episcopal Church. Now almost $3,000.000 have been raised. And yet the leaders of the church are not satisfied, but say that a big denomination of 4,000,000 members ought to give $5,000,000 a year. All denominations by their mission gifts realize the truth of Christ's words, "And the Gospel must first be published among all nations." (Mark 13 : 10.)

Government Honors Faithful Dog

THE faithful work of Sam, a stray dog which has assumed the task of guarding the bags of mail at Mount Carmel, Pa., was officially recognized by the Post Office Department. The dog has locked about his neck a heavy brass-studded collar bearing a plate engraved with the words: "U. S. Mail, presented to Uncle Sam's faithful friend by Albert S. Burleson, Postmaster General, October 25, 1916." Sam's special self-assigned task is that of guarding a parcel post wagon while the carrier is delivering. He never misses a trip. An admirer wrote to the department that as Sam is nobody's dog, recognition such as might insure him more consideration should be accorded. If everybody would do his duty according to his light as Sam does, the world would be farther along, and happier. The Jews had a very poor opinion of dogs. Christ represents them in this benevolent merciful picture: "Moreover the dogs came and licked his sores." (Luke 16 : 21.)

THE BREAD OF LIFE



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A., D.D.

TEXT—John 6:35. "I am the Bread of Life."

"I AM the Bread of Life." Then he claims to be more than our medicine; he claims to be our food. We speak of our Master as the Great Physician, and the name is one of the noblest of titles. We like to speak of him as one "who healeth all our diseases." We like to think of him as relieving the sick at heart, washing away the leprosy from an unclean mind, giving freedom to the passion-bound, putting out the fires in a fever-stricken soul. We like to proclaim his goodness and to tell the good news, that for the sicknesses of the soul there is a great Physician, whose medicines are sure to restore and redeem. We all feel that this remedial, curative power is one of the most glorious aspects of the Gospel, and it is an unspeakable privilege to be its herald; but we must not allow the proclamation of this great truth to silence or obscure another truth equally great.

Christ Jesus is indeed a great Physician; but he is more than that. He is indeed the soul's medicine, to rid it of disease; but he is more than that. He is the soul's food, to sustain its strength and preserve its health. If you do no longer need the Lord as medicine you still need him as bread. He says to us, "I am not merely to be called upon in cases of gross moral sickness or disease—some sudden outbreaks of vice, some feverish lust, some spiritual relapse. I must not merely be sent for in case of emergency, as you would send for a doctor. There comes a day when the doctor can be dispensed with. You can never dispense with me. I am not merely your medicine; I am your food. I am absolutely necessary to the preservation of spiritual health and strength. The health of your soul can no more be maintained without me than you can maintain the health of your body without bread. I am your bread: I am the Bread of Life."

NOW, I do not think we keep that great truth sufficiently well in mind. The prodigal needs Jesus as medicine: the restored prodigal has equal need of Jesus as bread. Jesus declares himself to be the food of the soul. Without him the soul will pine and starve. All other foods are ineffective and insufficient. They are not feeding. They leave the soul in leanness. "I am your bread; you cannot be strong without me; you cannot be healthy without me. I am the Bread of Life."

Well, now, what foods have men substituted for Jesus? What foods have been tried? Young men have sometimes asked, "What shall I do to keep myself morally healthy?" What kind of counsel has been given? Here is one of the foods which has often been recommended—Go in for hard work: there is nothing like hard work for keeping the devil at a distance. "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." Well, I am not about to disparage that counsel. I believe in the blessedness of labor. In the early days of the race, when our forefather Adam fell from a state of innocence into a state of guilt, the Lord cursed the ground for his sake. I believe that the curse upon the ground was full of blessings for the man. For what did it mean? It meant that God ordained that the ground should not yield its fruits to men except in return for the labor of man. When God cursed the ground he made labor a necessity. God wanted to bring Adam back into obedience and purity; he wanted to drain the evil humor from his spirit; and he saw that a state of indolence would not be helpful, and so he made him work in order that labor itself might be a minister to help him back to the condition he had lost.

Don't let us ever think of labor as a curse. The ground was cursed that labor might be a blessing. The ground was cursed for man's sake! So labor was ordained to be the helpmeet of man and it works its gracious purpose in the lives of men today.

Again and again I have heard men say: "So long as I am working I am all right; but when my work is over, then my temptations begin." Labor is their friend; labor helps to drain away their moral sewage. Many an evil desire passes away in the energy of hard work. I want, then, to proclaim hard work as the gracious helpmeet of man, and to say that the man who is engaged in hard work stands a much better chance of holding the devil at arm's length than a man who passes his days in indolence and ease.

But will hard work keep a man in moral and spiritual health? Is it an adequate food for the soul? No, no; hard work is a gracious minister, but it can't keep the soul in health, or there are some men who would have been saints long ago, but to whom none of their townsmen would ever think of pointing as types of a sound and healthy life. Hard work is good bread, but it is not the bread of life.

"WHAT then shall I do to keep myself healthy in spirit?" "Take up a hobby," is the reply that is often given. You will find that a hobby is a grand defense. Many a man has been loosed from the bondage of a vice by taking up a hobby. Take up a hobby!

This, again, is counsel I will not attempt to depreciate. I have given it myself again and again. A good hobby has been to many a man a good servant. It has been the extra horse that has pulled the wagon out of many a ditch. But the power of the hobby is limited, and is by no means sure. Many a man has been loosed from the bondage of vice by taking up music! That is true, and I rejoice in it. But, on the other hand, many a man, by taking up music, has been brought into the bondage of vice. I am not saying that to disparage music; I am only saying it to indicate that a hobby may utterly fail to lift a man into moral and spiritual health. An astronomer may be irreverent and undevout. A musician may be passionate and lustful. A literary man may have a heart like a cesspool. An artist may be a drunkard. A man may have a hobby and still retain an unclean spirit. It is good to have a hobby. It will often take away your weariness and your moodiness, and give you rest by change. A hobby is good bread; it is not the bread of life.

So you might take up the other foods with which men feed their minds and souls, and upon every one of them we should have to pronounce the judgment that they are quite inadequate and insufficient to obtain and retain moral and spiritual health. You may feed on what you like; you will be driven at last to feel the insufficiency of all foods except him who s d, "I am the Bread of Life."

"I AM the Bread of Life." He is not onl a food, a necessary food, but a necessary d ly food. Do we ever spend a day without Chr t? Do not let us delude ourselves with the fa y that we can take liberties with our soul which e dare not take with our flesh. Do not let us be deceived into thinking that it takes more at n- tion to keep up the health of the body tha it takes to keep up the health of the soul. ou give your body daily bread; don't think y ur soul requires less.

Why, there are some of my hearers who if they had given as much thought and pains o the adorning of their spirit as they have don o the adorning of their bodies, would have m le the angels of God rejoice long ago, in t ir beautiful garments of salvation. And for ll of us, if we gave as much consideration to e necessity of feeding our souls as we do to e necessity of feeding our bodies, we should l g ago have risen into a spiritual power wh h would have rendered us invincible, and made p heroes and heroines in every cause that is g d and true. But you know how it is. Ch st declares, "I am the Bread of Life," and pr - tically, whatever we may do theoretically, m y of us send back the response, "Bread! the I will feed on thee once a week; I will feed n thee every Sunday when I meet my breth n in thy house!" And all the time he is teach g us to pray, "Give us this day our daily brea " in order to make us feel that the meal is a d y and not a weekly necessity.

Any one who feeds on the bread of life o y once a week will never rise above a weakli ; he will never put on the purity and healthi s of a strong son of God. It is the man who ma s the Lord his daily meal—aye, who feeds u n the bread many times a day, who surrou s himself with a spiritual healthiness—of whom e devil is afraid.

"I AM the Bread of Life." Take your m s daily and regularly. I have sometimes - marked to a friend that he was not looking w ; that he seemed to be worn and run down. A d the reply has been given, "Yes, I have had o much to do lately that I have neglected y regular meals! Sometimes I have gone with t my dinner, and then I have got past my ap - tite; and then I have run down." So I fou d out that if a business man neglects his regu r meals, he has to pay for the neglect in a lowe d vitality, in impoverished health.

Is there no spiritual analogy? When men, neglect of their body, lower its vitality, th open the gates to any infection or epider which may possibly be round about. It is ev so with the soul. A man who has neglected t bread of life, and so lowered his spiritual - tality, offers an opportunity to moral disea . Temptations have most power when there s least prayer. The devil finds it a comparativ easy matter to conquer any soul which has be impaired by neglect.

Take the bread of life, and feed on it oft and regularly. Maintain your soul in healt, and your very healthiness shall be your defen yea, as a wall of fire, which cannot be brok through.

The Simplication of Life

SUNDAY, December 10. Matt. 19 : 14. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Simplicity is one of the great characteristics of the supreme life as taught and revealed by Jesus Christ our d. He was always seeking to lead people back n the impoverished life in which the currents are gish, and the arteries are hardened, and all the vements are stiff and formal. He would con-ain us back into the realm of vital freedom, where is liquid and musical, and where intercourse is ural and unconventional. "Except ye turn, and ome as little children!" That was a tone of ning, as that indeed is the line of promise. If our is to be wholesome and progressive, we must eatedly turn from the age of stone, which comes h the years, to the plastic and unexhausted sus-tibility of a little child.

Morley has somewhere said that simplification is keynote of the Reformation. It pierced behind artificial and conventional to the natural man and ural life. But this is surely true of every healthy olution: its movement is from the complicated to single, from the technical to the vital, from merely traditional to the original springs. tendency is from palsied age to the little ld.

Crises continually arise which compel us to get rid exhausting encumbrances. We have become over-rdened with the multiplication of harness. It is t always the ordinary load of life which crushes us; is the increasingly heavy and complicated means ich we have devised to draw it. Our yoke is more ling than our burden; the harness is more harass- than the load. The complications increase with years. Society becomes a steel network of hard, ificial bonds, instead of remaining a sweet, elastic d lovely fellowship. Prayer becomes fossilized. eology grows arid and technical. Public worship comes mere church-going, as tedious as the making conventional social calls. "She has God on her iting list!" Think of the formality and artifici-ty which hide behind that vivid phrase! Every-ing grows hard and unelastic in the conventional ip, drip of a petrifying formality.

And so there is imperative need of crises and revo-ions which will compel us to seek a simplification life and thought and feeling, and which will make turn again and become as a little child. And y not this be one of the deep secrets of the time rough which we are passing? May not this divine nplification be one of its glorious issues? Things re becoming fearfully stiff and conventional. Now are going to become more natural, which will mean ore fraternal, more genially accessible to one other, more reverently hospitable to our Lord. e are going to learn of him, and in meekness and wliness, we shall find that our yoke is easy and our rden is light. The Crown of Faithfulness MONDAY, December 11. Rev. 2 : 10. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown life." Almost certainly the holy Polycarp was the gel or pastor of the church at Smyrna. His pupil enæus tells how, as a young man, he loved to sit his feet and hear him discourse of his own young ys, when he used to listen to the aged apostle John calling his blessed fellowship with our Lord. Irenæus re witness to Polycarp, Polycarp to John, and hn to the Lord. From his banishment in Patmos e apostle writes to the young pastor at Ephesus, d bids him, in the name of the Lord, be faithful nto death. At the time the words were written, ere may have been mutterings of the coming horror persecution, but the veil of the impenetrable future as not wholly withdrawn, and neither John nor olycarp realized the full significance of this exhorta-on. God graciously veils our sight. But the storm roke in full fury when Polycarp was 86 years of ge. I have stood on the site of the fire in which e was burned alive because the lions, to which he ould otherwise have been thrown, were sated with hristian flesh. Rather than disown the Master, e freely offered himself as a sacrifice, when a single rain of incense offered to Cæsar would have saved im. But he has been crowned with glorious life t the hands of our Lord! May we be enabled to ndure temptation and trial, that we also may receive hat crown of life, which the Lord has promised to hem that love him. F. B. M.

Self-Pity

TUESDAY, December 12. Job. 19 : 21. "Have pity upon me, O ye my friends!" Of all the heroic characters pictured in the Old Testament, Job stands out with a peculiar prominence. Yet the courage of his soul faltered at times under his affliction, and the desire for pity and the consciousness of his woes came to be uppermost.

A young Canadian friend, at the very threshold of a promising career, was suddenly stricken down with tuberculosis. He was obliged to go at once to the Adirondacks, severing abruptly all the ties to the work with which he was united, as he thought, for life. It seemed a hard and stunning blow. After spending about eight months in the mountains, he recovered partially, and I met him in the city one day. I said to him, "What did you learn up there in the mountains?" He answered, "I learned one great lesson. I freed myself from self-pity."

We need to examine at times the root reason for self-pity. If we trace it back far enough, we shall find it lodged in a more or less morbid self-love. We say "We are not appreciated," or "My friends do not understand me," or "My lot is harder than that of other people." The more we keep such thoughts in mind and gloat over them, the more abnormal we become in our feelings, and more and more do our comparatively small ailments appear to be the center of the universe. We lose the all-embracing Christian sense of interest in others, and, with that interest, a desire of outgoing love and service for others. True Christianity can hardly exist in the same life with self-pity; for a great Christian is one according to Jesus, who loses his life and forgets himself in the larger and heavenly objective of helping some one else.

A good daily prayer is: "Lord, save me from self-pity!" C. S. C.

When the Soul Leans Upon God

WEDNESDAY, December 13. Dan. 9 : 1–19. "I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer." For eighty years prayer was a marked feature of Daniel's life. His foes dreaded the power he had with God, and made it the chief point of their attack. He knew that the prayer of one earnest soul might affect the destiny of a nation. But he is not alone on the page of history in this. John Knox thought so, and Mary of Scotland feared his prayers more than all the troops of the king of France. Gustavus Adolphus thought so, and frequently summoned his generals to his tent for prayer. Washington prayed at Valley Forge, and Lincoln, in the crises of the Civil War, leaned on prayer. When we see things as they really are, we shall probably discover that more national changes were due to the prayer of God's people than to the scheming of politicians or the statecraft of kings.

But Daniel's prayer teaches that the true basis of successful approach to God is his own word of promise. The prophecies of Jeremiah were being circulated among the captives and eagerly read. Among them were such words as these: "After seventy years are accomplished at Babylon,.I will visit you and perform my good word to you in causing you to return to this place." It was clear that the time specified had nearly expired, and Daniel set himself to pray for it. Underneath every promise or prophecy there is the implicit condition: "For all these things I will be enquired of."

True prayer does not originate in us, but in God. We take him at his word, ask him to do as he has said, and our prayer becomes the medium through which the answer comes. F. B. M.

The Triumph of Good

THURSDAY, December 14. Rev. 21 : 27. "And there shall in no wise enter into it anything unclean, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, and a lie." This revealed picture of the City of God is not a threat but a promise. It unveils for an instant the final victories of the children of God. It stirs a new hope in our breasts, struggling here amidst the evil that seems a part of us and mixed with the ingredients of daily life, as we come to realize that the reign of wrong, of untruth and of sin is not to be permanent. It is the divine announcement that evil must die!

"Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever lord of Death,
And Love can never lose its own!"

Even though, in the Book of Genesis, we are told that the sins of the fathers are to be visited upon the children, it seems that there are clear boundaries beyond which this visitation is not permitted to pass. We know this, if we stop to think. There may have been great evil-doers in a family line; yet the descendants of today may be good men. The dominance of the old sin is wiped out by the cleansing stream of new virtues.

The very heart of the New Testament Gospel of good news is to fit men for this pure city mentioned in Revelation. We are saved by faith, as Paul tells us, even before we are sanctified or worthy of that salvation. We are accepted, as Jesus says, even while we are yet sinners, if only we earnestly desire to put the sin behind us and to begin this purer life. By forgiveness we receive permission to enter the golden city. It is God's work as well as ours. This is the message of the Cross. C. S. C.

Pleading for Others

FRIDAY, December 15. Ezra 9 : 1–15. "O my God, I om ashamed and blush." The Jews, by their intermarriage with the surrounding heathen, had lapsed into a condition which seemed to Ezra very terrible. It had to do not so much with individuals as with the structure of society, and with the future of the Hebrew race. The manner in which Ezra met this social wrong is instructive. He was not content to criticize the action of those who had married into these families. His first act was to repent of those sins, as though they were his own. He fell upon his knees before all the people, and with an intensity of humiliation he entreated God as for his own pardon.

Our great exemplar, Jesus, though sinless, went into the river Jordan, and was baptized unto repentance. Of what sins had he to repent, who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners? Certainly, none of his own. He confessed the sins of his people and of humanity with which he identified himself, and so we are taught that there is a vicarious repentance and confession to be practiced in our prayers. We must not only repent of our own sins, and so hope to become saints, but we must seek to be saviours, and it is only as we become saviours that we are really saints. We must not content ourselves with a transient, emotional repentance. True repentance never ceases with the utterance of its bitterness. They who are pricked to the heart will cry, "What must we do?" Ezra not only repented, but set to work to reform society. It is they who feel sin most acutely who will be the first to take steps to reform the abuses out of which it springs.

The Wonderful Christmas Gift

SATURDAY, December 16. II Cor. 9 : 15. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable Gift." Bethlehem is the goal of man's weary march. Here we receive the gift of the Child-Christ, who is to become our Saviour from sin, our hope from despair and our life from the dead. The door of the stable opens into the pathway to the palace of the King. The humblest is the holiest place.

The child of Bethlehem's manger, the poorest and weakest of earth, one day will be King of the Universe, crowned with many crowns. Angels are his attendants; wise men his worshipers. A new star is the finger pointing to his birthplace, the shepherds are his watchers and all the future his realm.

The wonderful Christmas Gift is yours, if you will take the Christ into your heart; but if the door to your being like the inn, is closed against him, if there is no room for him in your darkened soul, you will suffer regret, disgrace and sorrow. The greatness of the Gift is indescribable, because with him you have all other treasures—all other needs supplied.

Human language fails to portray more than the fringe of his robes, the beginnings of his power, the touch of his fingers. The unspeakableness of his infinite love will ever invite the affectionate approach of his followers. E. W. C.

OUR MAIL-BAG

WE are devoting the entire Mail-Bag page in this issue to the replies which have been called out by the letter of A. M. L., Harrison, Mo. which appeared in our issue of October 25. A. M. L., the mother of six children, and herself a Christian, asked to hear from Christian parents, who had brought up children in their homes, how they conducted family worship, and especially from those who succeeded in teaching their children to be Christians. The replies received are given below.

HOW A MOTHER OF SIX TRAINED THEM

I HAVE a family of six children, ages sixteen years to three years. I feel it is a great work the Lord has given my husband and me to train them up for his service. A mother is necessarily kept close at home, and though I feel we should be ready and willing to take up outside duties as the Lord makes them plain, I feel our first duty is to our children.

We set up our family worship at the beginning of our home life. When our oldest son was three or four I bought a folding blackboard, 6x12, which has hung in our big kitchen (and is still there), where all of us can easily see it from the dining-table. In years past I have had the Golden Text written there, or some other passages, which we would learn together, or perhaps two or three Bible questions, changing every week—also other devices to help Bible familiarity. We have always practiced union family worship for Sunday morning—I mean all taking part in prayer. My oldest son began when he was very small, and for five years he was the only child. Now they all take part. Even the three-year-old baby, when she heard the other children praying for Charles (who is away at school now), repeated over and over, "Keep Charles." We have always followed the International Sunday School Bible readings, and then sing the Doxology, repeat the Golden Text, followed by prayer from father (or mother, if father was away), and closing with the Lord's Prayer all together. We took pains to explain the Bible reading.

The Christian influence does not confine itself to family worship alone, but it is all the time. I have taken great pains with the children's reading, to guide it in the best ways. Pansy's (Mrs. G. B. Alden's) books are well known and have a great Christian influence. I have added to our library every year. Our means are limited, and it means a good deal to educate six children for God's service in the world; but these books and other devices I consider great helps, and not money spent in vain. The entire family are members of the Sunday school now, and, last but not least, our children have a good conscientious father, who, though very busy, is always ready to cooperate with me in any plan for our children's good. A MOTHER.

A CALIFORNIA MOTHER'S PLAN

I HAVE three children, two of whom are married. All three are consecrated Christians. My husband is a Presbyterian minister. We considered our children our chief responsibility. As soon as they were able to notice, they found that they were to be quiet during family worship morning and evening. They learned the Westminster Catechism and that the Bible is God's Word, and was to be the guide of their lives. We had the pleasure of seeing them, early in their young lives, become the professed disciples of the Lord.

HOW A SISTER BORE THE BURDEN

AT the death of my mother, there were left in my care five younger brothers and two sisters, the baby being four years old. I was not a Christian then. For one year I tried to do for my flock alone, but failed. Realizing the great responsibility, I wrote my uncle, and through his writings I accepted Christ as my Saviour. Then I started family worship. Just before bedtime we would have prayers and song. Each had a special prayer and all would pray. Each selected a hymn. Those were the happiest moments of the day.

See that all attend as many services as possible; not the children alone, but parents also. I attended morning service, Sunday school and Epworth League, with my whole flock. Sunday meals were cooked Saturday, all clothes laid out. I had everything to do alone, besides taking in washing to make ends meet. My boys and girls are all now members of James M. E. Church of Brooklyn, N. Y.

It requires much prayer, patience and fellowship with God's people. With Christ at the head success is sure. L. H. E. W.

AN AMERICAN MOTHER'S HERITAGE TO HER CHILDREN

MY mother was one of the wise and good. Her "method" worked in rearing a family. Previous to marriage she had lived in several homes where children were conspicuously unruly, and was heard to say, "If ever I have children of my own, they shall be taught to mind, if they are not taught anything else."

I was the youngest of six children; three, however, died early. Mother was widowed when I was seven years old. We were on a farm, which she managed eleven years and on which she brought up her little family. Each child was responsible for certain chores. "Chores," by the way, is a very elastic word, embracing many duties. I worked hard as a child, yet the discipline was salutary. Obedient children generally spring from obedient parents—obedient to the Word. "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." Note the word "train" instead of "bring." "Trained to be obedient" is not so apprehensive a term as many make it, evidently associating it with rod and rule; yet discipline can be tempered with wisdom as with a shield.

I have no recollection of being "governed." Howbeit, "Line upon line, line upon line; precept upon precept, precept upon precept," was uniformly associated with home rule. I have heard mother say, advising young mothers along this line, "Begin early; most of the training of your child can be done before it is two years old."

I now perceive that the underlying reason of such a course was more from principle than pleasure; since it behooves a mother ever to maintain the place of habitual honor and regard in the hearts of her children. I have observed otherwise. I have seen a mother go to the cellar for coal, to the well for water, while two stout sons were sitting in the kitchen. In earlier days she had unwittingly consented to be a drudge, and so it continued. She had not put a timely check on the negative "I will" and "I won't" of the child. A child reared in such a manner will, in all likelihood, assume a wilful course, rebel against authority, lose self-respect as well as respect for others, and, without reasoning, more or less directly rob itself of every instinctive virtue.

Again, sanguine forecast in child-training is a radical cause of failure. Taking things for granted is a delusive argument and shows lack of knowledge. Quite frequently we hear a fond mother decide thus in favor of herself: "I think Willie will do better as he grows older and can be reasoned with." Consequently, when children are mere babies, they are allowed to talk back saucily; the mother hiding a secret smile behind an uplifted hand, while baby is indulged in defiant prattle because it sounds "cute"; the child, meantime, instinctively observing. Then, for the sake of those present, the mother will assume an air of grave reproof and say remonstratively: "Baby mustn't talk that way—No! no! it's naughty!" But baby has caught the evasive smile, the suggestive wink, and what more need be added? Eye-gate is more retentive than ear-gate.

I would like to add a further word in regard to my mother, which I trust will not be considered a digression, since it involves a quality ever noticeable in her life; namely, her firm reliance upon the Word of God. The family Bible—usually open on the table—was often referred to as she paused to get a crumb of comfort whereby to tread the daily round.

She once incurred a lawsuit through no fault of hers. A man who worked the farm and lived in a part of the house was the aggressive party. The case was formidable and involved much. Mother, whose nature shrank from such embarrassment, suggested settlement, arbitration, all to no purpose. The suspense of action was unavoidably wearing. Once or twice she went to the county seat where the case was called, only to hear, "The suit has been postponed." One day she came in from a walk with a light step and said, "I'm not going to worry any more; the Lord has spoken. He said, 'Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity; for they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither, as the green herb.'"

She engaged no lawyer, notwithstanding the advice and importunity of many friends, who said, in substance, "The opposing party will pick you all to pieces if you don't get a lawyer!" Mother was firm, and said to the judge at court, "I'm going to trust you to decide this matter." It is sufficient to say she won! Plaintiff and defendant returned on the same train, to dwell under the same roof. His spirit was greatly humbled. Her heart rejoiced in the Lord! She had tried God's Word—God's promise—and had proved it to be "wonderful in counsel and excellent in working." In the days that followed, she shunned controversy and dwelt in peace.

As she lived—so she died—"being old and full of days." The memory of those "days" is a record that has wrought decisively with me in many a trying place. A legacy so precious that its worth cannot be estimated. "Gold cannot be given in exchange for it, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof."

Alliance, O. J. E. L.

REVERENCE TO CHRIST OUR GREATEST HERITAGE

JUST as soon as our children were able to talk, they were taught to say their prayers at night and at meal time. We had a lovely book, called "Half Hours with Jesus." Every Sunday afternoon we would sit together and I would explain a few sacred pictures and make them acquainted with them. When they were a little older, I would read to them out of the same book, and ask them questions. Sunday mornings we would play Sunday school in their play-room before they were old enough to attend. How they would enjoy the singing and answering the questions. How many happy hours they recall to my mind!

They have grown up to be a great blessing and comfort to their parents. Reverence to our Saviour is the greatest heritage we can give our children. C. W.

A PENNSYLVANIA MOTHER TELLS OF HER METHOD

MY method was, as soon as the child was able to talk or remember, to teach him verses out of the Bible (New Testament) every week and explain them to him and explain the way to heaven. In my everyday prayer I asked God to guard and guide my child to a Christian life.

In family worship each child ought to take part, to read a verse or more, the same as mother and father, and questions are asked as to what we can learn of these verses. In prayer each child can say a few words, such as "God bless us," "God be with us," etc. The parents ought to read the Bible every day before retiring, if only a few verses. The book "Golden Treasury for the Children of God" is good daily reading. A. M. K.

HOW A MOTHER WON HER LITTLE ONES TO CHRIST

MY now sainted wife, an humble, earnest, God-submissive Christian, won her only two boys to be Christians. She herself was a whole-hearted follower of him who said, "I will be with you always," and "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he will give it you." By faith she kept a tight grip on these two golden promises.

The boys, three years apart in age, were from babyhood her companions to Sunday school and church services. Where she felt it safe to go, her boys could go; where she worshiped was also a place good enough for her boys to be. She procured an illustrated Bible and set aside an hour for devotion, Bible reading and prayer with her boys, explaining to them the vital truth as it is found in Christ Jesus; how God promised that he would guide, keep and protect them from all harm of body, soul and spirit. These teachings laid a sure and lasting foundation, and to our great joy they were converted, confessing Jesus as their personal Saviour, at the ages of thirteen and fourteen years. When she lay dying they solemnly vowed in her presence that with God's help they would remain steadfast. This promise they have faithfully kept. F. P.

AN ARIZONA MOTHER'S EXPERIENCE

AS our home is a parsonage and Sunday the busiest day of the week, it was absolutely necessary to do all possible work on Saturday. As Sunday was the Lord's Day, we felt the house must be in best order, the food the best in all the week, the clothes the best, and also all pastimes. Sabbath services were taught as a privilege, not a duty simply.

It was a pleasure to plan and anticipate the menu. As our darlings were extravagantly fond of cookies, these were often made on Saturday; some shaped as men, or babes, or horses, etc. As the mother was no artist, it took a powerful imagination to decide at times what the cooky represented; but children do not lack in imagination. These were kept for Sunday morning. As breakfast and d were farther apart on Sunday and little p might get hungry and hence restless in ch (ours were trained to attend both Su school and morning service), a lunch of co was permitted when the first Sunday s bell rang. Three little pairs of feet cou heard running and baby would cry "Mamma, bell, coodie!" Such fun, e off a man's head, or a boy's leg, or even a horse before Sunday school!

Then they were eager for the Sunday d After their naps their mother's after belonged to them. The big family Bible f pictures, story books (all of which te Godward), Sunday Bible games, and e Sunday doll were brought out, and these not allowed on week-days. The bui blocks made so many churches, etc. Al very best was saved for Sunday. We wer a little amused when tiny daughter name superintendent of the primary class "Su Burton," and though now a married wom the mission fields of India, today she silver napkin ring inscribed with her and "from Sunday Burton" among treasures. Again and again I sprang question on them unexpectedly, "Chil what day of all the week is best?" And would cry out unanimously and hea "Sunday!"

As they grew older and entered college always expected the best on Sunday. we tried to make Isa. 58 : 13-14 very to them. While they are now in homes of own, I believe they remember their child Sabbaths as delightful days. All are a Christians. MRS. W.

The Save-a-Life Movement

ALTHOUGH it has not been so called, the great relief work that is going on in this country in behalf of the innocent sufferers he war in Europe is in fact a Save-a- Movement. We have already wn that conservative estimates place number of destitute people at over 00,000. These people are literally ng kept alive day by day. That is to , those of the number and of the daily itions to the number who survive their dships. We must not forget that usands perish daily. Perish from ger; die from exposure; perish from sufferings that have been forced upon m. Nor must we forget for a moment t these people have committed no lt. They are innocent bystanders, as ere, over whom in moments of mad- s the marching armies have ruth- ly trod. These people were engaged heir ordinary occupations and were ing no part in the war. But their nes and their villages and their farms e in the "war zones." War zones, as all know, are sacred to the worship Mars. And Mars must have his rifices. The devotees of that bloody nster in their mad orgies spare not nor sex. How many millions of ocent victims have perished in this ody festival of war cannot yet be own. And indeed we need not concern selves now with the dead. It is the ng for whom we must be concerned; l we know the number who daily ke their prayer to America.

the face of the tremendous task which confronts America, it is ouraging to recall to mind that ady many millions of dollars have n freely given for the relief work t has been conducted in the different ds from the very beginning of the d. It is also encouraging to take e of the statement made at the cennial Anniversary of the Laymen's ssionary Movement, by J. Campbell ite, President of Wooster College, ose accuracy in computing the ources, physical and otherwise, of Christian Church is undisputed: he Christian people of America ld give $2,000,000 a day for Christian rk in addition to what they already giving, and still not give one-tenth their income." The speaker was erring not to all America as Chris- ns, but to the professing Christians America. One billion dollars a year, stated, would about represent one- nth of the possessions of the Christian rtion of the population. At present ut $250,000,000 are given for all ristian purposes.

It is manifest that a large proportion our Christian population is falling below the Old Testament standard a tenth to the Lord. We will not sume to know the mind of the Lord respects the use of all the gifts that ght be laid before him for his dis- sal; but we believe that if this deficit $750,000,000 were to be made up for year 1917, enough of it would be ministered by his divine command ong the suffering people of Europe save them from destruction and from terrible miseries that now oppress them. And we also suggest that if this money is not forthcoming from those who profess his name we do not know from where it will come.

We say this with all reverence. We believe that he has made his followers not only the stewards of his wealth, but administrators of it in his name. He has committed to us all the task of bearing one another's burdens. We are confronted by a positive condition of things in the lands where war rages. We can let our prayers arise ceaselessly night and day for a miracle of charity to descend out of heaven and save us the cost and the labor of writing that glorious chapter in the history of the world. But we do not believe that such prayers will be answered while we, the Christian people of America, hoard or spend on ourselves the $750,000,000 that is still needed to make up the minimum that God ever asked his people to deflect from their own personal uses to the glorifying of his name.

AGREAT deal is being said about the shipment abroad of food-stuffs as being an important factor in the increasing cost of living in this country. An exception, however, must certainly be made in the case of food-stuffs and other necessities which are sent for the relief of these homeless and destitute noncombatants. The good ship Cæsar, the Christmas ship of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, which is rapidly being made ready to sail as these lines are written, should be the first of a fleet of food-laden and clothing-laden vessels sent out from our shores for the help of these unfortunates.

So urgent is the need in Armenia and Syria that it has been felt imperative to add $5,000 from the Christian Herald Relief Fund to the $20,000 previously given toward the provisioning of this ship. Accordingly we have contracted in the name of Christian Herald readers to pay for wheat, flour, condensed milk, rice and lima beans to the total value of $25,000 to be sent in the Cæsar. This is a fair proportion of the entire cargo, and is one of the very best uses to which our fund has been put. This ship with its precious cargo, therefore, should be accompanied on its journey by the prayers and interest of all our readers. But shall we rest there?

Nearly all parts of our own country have already felt the return of winter. To most of us it is balmy and kind in comparison with the wintry scourge that has these millions of fellow beings in its grip in Europe. The need, wherever war has been, is immediate and urgent and dreadful. Let us put to work at once every dollar we can spare, each and all of us, in the practical relief of this unspeakable suffering.

PLEASE let every reader understand that in providing the Monthly Offering Clubs as one of the best ways for doing good, it is not the only way. If fifty dollars is available at this moment, give the fifty dollars whether you can look ahead to another gift or not. If five dollars or one dollar can be given now, give it now. The Monthly Offering Clubs are intended to facilitate continuous giving. Do not let a "system," however good, in the least degree lessen your present impulse to give. The Monthly Offering Clubs are designed as an assistance to all who wish to set themselves to giving regularly to worthy causes, relief of war sufferers included. We ask you to join one or another of these clubs if you can, and for your reminder we again publish the names of the clubs.

Last week we published the names of seventy-five persons who had enlisted. The number increases daily. At an early opportunity, probably in the Christmas issue, we will publish the additional enrolment. Send your first monthly contribution with your enrolment if you can, and regularly thereafter each month send the amount you name or more, or, if you find it impossible to keep up the amount, less. But adopt the systematic form of giving, if you possibly can. You will find it a blessed thing before you have been very long at it.

THE immediate thing, however, is to save a life in Europe today. Join this Save-a-Life Movement. Do not be content, either, with saving a life for a day, but make it your business to save a life for a week and a month and a year. Exact figures are not available, but we believe fifty dollars applied through the various committees of relief is sufficient to sustain one person through a year. Mind you, that is merely keeping life in the body. Why not be responsible for at least that much? At any rate, save a life for a while. (Just consider that remark, "save a life for a while." How glibly it is said—but how much it means to a mother who still has her little children about her and still hopes for better days to come!)

Christmas in the Trenches

AGROUP of French soldiers were standing in the deep trench, twelve inches of chalky mud at its bottom. There were about twenty of them. They entertained each other with the simple folk-songs of their districts, and examined Christmas parcels from relatives and friends.

One soldier read a little note from home: "This year it is I who play father. This year I broke open my savings bank to send a present to dear papa in the trenches." The soldier's thick, neglected beard could not hide the proud smile with which he read these words.

"THEY'RE singing over there, too," said a soldier just back from the first line trench. "And they're shouting 'Merry Christmas!' but it doesn't sound very gay with shells falling no one knows when or where."

THROUGHOUT the great labyrinths of trenches in the war zones of Europe, the Christmas season is necessarily but an attempt at merry-making. Last year Christmas Day broke over the British front, "wet and blowing and altogether cheerless." As the day advanced, however, the sun gleamed through the mists. And there was a more cheerful feeling in the hearts of the men who spent their Christmas in the trenches and ate their Christmas puddings while they dodged shrapnel.

CRAMPED in smoky trenches, the soldiers of the various warring nations think of the happy home festivities and the gay companionship of the home folks. "We don't want to stop and think more than we can help," is the opinion of the trench-warriors. "We just want to get on with it, so that we may sooner be finished."

In places where the enemy lines skirt each other closely, the deep Christmas chants of the Germans almost mingle with the lighter chorusing of British and French. But there is no more attempt at fraternizing between the opposing forces. The war leaders disapprove of it. The one source of Christmas joy in the trenches is the thoughtfulness of the home folks, who plan all sorts of pleasant remembrances for the men in the field. Queen Mary's Fund sends large supplies from England. Even the school children in Germany practice self-denial for the sake of the soldiers.

TO the man in the trench, however, the best Christmas gift is a Christmas furlough—a few days' leave of absence. One class of British soldiers will not remain in the trenches on Christmas eve. These are the men from Cornwall (many of whom are miners), who hold to the old tradition that it is an evil omen for anyone to enter a cellar on Christmas Eve, when the imps and elves of the supernatural world are supposed to hold high carnival.

To spend Christmas in the trenches is a great sacrifice on the part of the French soldiers. Among these are the skilful artisans who formerly made the little cribs and mangers representing the Child Jesus asleep, with Mary and Joseph bending over him, with the cattle in the stable of Bethlehem, and the golden angels floating over the stable. The soldiers may shout "Noël! Noël!" as they used to do in Paris on Christmas Day. But they miss their great "réveillon" or feast, their New Year's gifts, and their "Fête des Fons," which falls on Twelfth Night or the Epiphany, when the three wise men are supposed to have reached the manger at Bethlehem.

Real Waffles

EVERYBODY likes waffles. They may be served appropriately for breakfast, luncheon or supper. They are extraordinarily good when Crisco is used in the batter and especially crisp as well as unusually dainty when cooked in Criscoed irons.

CRISCO
For Frying-For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco is the solid cream of vegetable oil. It is delicate and rich and has neither taste nor odor.

Over a million American housewives are consistent users of Crisco. They like it because it helps them to serve foods that are appetizing and wholesome.

Delicious Waffles

They are Particularly Fine When Served With Maple Syrup or Honey

3 cupfuls flour
½ teaspoonful baking soda
1 teaspoonful salt
1 tablespoonful sugar
2 egg yolks
2 cupfuls sour milk
2 tablespoonfuls melted Crisco
2 stiffly beaten egg whites

(Use accurate level measurements)

Sift, then measure the flour. Add to it the soda, salt and sugar, and sift into bowl. Add well beaten egg yolks, then the milk, then the melted Crisco. Beat thoroughly and fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Cook on well Criscoed waffle irons until brown and crisp.

The Crisco Library

You should secure the latest books of the Crisco Library. Handsomely bound and illustrated in colors and both written by Janet McKenzie Hill, of the Boston Cooking School and editor of American Cookery. Send for "The Whys of Cooking". You may find some of your own household problems among the many questions asked and answered. "Balanced Daily Diet" describes a simple system of meal planning with choice of foods best adapted to the proper building of mental and physical strength. Either book will make a valuable gift and each contains many new recipes and the interesting Story of Crisco. Sent for five 2-cent stamps or enclose twenty cents for both. CHAPTER XIII—Continued

THE days and weeks and months dragged by, and then a year and another long year started, in just the same way. We were rotting. There was not anywhere near enough work to keep us busy, and so we rotted in those 3½ x 6 x 7 holes in that pile of granite put there eighty-two years ago for men to suffer in, that their evil ways might be made good ways. What a chance! Finally the day drew near when I could appear before the Parole Board. Mrs. Booth, the "Little Mother," as she is affectionately called by thousands of "cons" and "ex-cons," came regularly to the prison. I attended her services simply because by so doing I could get out of my cell for a short time. And then one day I spoke to her and she offered to help me secure my release provided I would do as I should have done long ago. Like I had done hundreds and hundreds of times before, I made a promise on my honor to reform and serve God from then on!

And so Mrs. Booth secured my release, after a stubborn fight before the Parole Board.

Was I thankful and grateful? Yes, just long enough to get clear of the joint, that's all. The "Little Mother" sent me to Hope Hall, where so many of her boys have come to realize what right means and how good it feels to be right—where so many of her boys have found God.

Like a low-down cur, I skipped in a couple of weeks and landed down and out in New York, but this time in a new section—the Bowery.

In my report to the Parole officer each month, I lied and had not the slightest difficulty in getting away with it.

CHAPTER XIV

AT THE BOTTOM OF THE BOTTOM

JUST as there is but one New York and one Paris and one Venice, so there is but one Bowery!

There's no other street in the world like it that I know of. It's peopled with the dregs of humanity from the four corners of the globe—good and bad men, but all of them down and out. Down so far that not many of them ever get back. Down so low that there's just one of two things left to do—get up, or die!

The cheap, dirty lodging-houses are packed to the doors nightly with these poor fellows, some of whom are there reaping the harvest of their own sowing, while others there are the cruel victims of circumstances over which they had little or no control.

The thief, the "dip," the "yegg," the "con," the black sheep of the well-to-do family, the green-goods man, all of them are there, too old or broken to longer carry on their shady trades. The sick men, young and old, good and bad, they are there, too, roaming about, eating and sleeping when and where they can, hoping against hope that the next moment may be their last. The bum is there, too, living but never working, and he's there in goodly numbers.

By far the greatest number, though, are there because of their inability or unwillingness to desert the ranks of Old King Booze. You can't call it alcohol, it's anything but that. Those fellows can't get a "kick" out of real whisky, and many of them can't get one out of "third rail." What a life!

There's still another class there, and heaven forbid that it should continue. It's the young class, composed of boys who have been unable to resist the call to come to the great city expecting to find plenty of helping hands and lots of work. Who is there, tell me, to take these boys by the hand? They wind up, after the small purse is gone, on the Bowery.

Among that motley, frightful population I fitted into a waiting place. They are always waiting for new-comers down there, and they don't have to wait long, either—that's the greatest pity of it all—they come faster than they go. Thus the great change that has taken place in the last few years is accounted for. There was a time when real "bad men" haunted the Bowery, and there pulled down their drag. Not so today, for the hard men and the gangs have gone east or west and some north, and left the old street exclusively for the men nearly through—for the man who has failed.

Failed! Yes, that's it—the Bowery might well be called the Street of Failures!

Was I a failure? I wouldn't have admitted it then. I'd soon be back up town. I remember I figured it out that way.

WHILE I had been doing my "bit" up the river, I had worked out an elaborate system to beat the ponies, and had figured that with $1,537 I could beat the bookmakers to a crisp. Anyone would think that I'd been up against them often enough to know that, in the long run, they always held the trump card and couldn't be beaten. It takes a long time to teach some people, doesn't it?

It seemed as though it ought to be very easy to get $1,500. In the old days, I could have done it, maybe in a day; certainly in a week. But on the Bowery it might take two weeks, I figured. So at it I went. The pickin' was poor, my pep had gone, and the rotgut I'd been drinking for whisky had taken all the flexibility out of both fingers and brain. Suckers were few and far between, and when you did get one a ten-spot was a big haul. I never really knew how many Ingersoll watches there were until I saw the Bowery worked. I never got the fifteen hundred or anything like it.

A night or two ago, as I walked up that old sin-soaked sidewalk, I passed a party of slummers—men in evening clothes, attending an equal number of expensively dressed women. It gave me a start, for do you know the feelings a party like that arouses in the hearts of the poor wretches that infest the dives down there?

I'll tell you! Picture a back room of a saloon, carpeted with dirty sawdust two inches deep, spotted here and there with filthy spittoons full and overflowing. One or two yellow gas flames vainly trying to fight a roomful of foul, smoke-laden air. Imagine a dozen to two dozen half-dead, half-fed, half-mad, half-clad men lolling and lying around in cheap, rickety chairs. Some are dead drunk, some are fighting drink, while the remainder would like to be drunk, only they haven't the price. And then, somehow, by means of a never-failing underground system of communication, comes the single word "Slummers!"

The swells troop in, a merry, laughing crowd, trying hard to act as though they were quite accustomed to it all. They are more careful about ordering drinks than they need be. They are served the best in the house, and the boss sees it reaches them right. No "petering" a lot of drinks like that; it would mean too big a fuss.

Some one of the men pulls out a bunch of yellow stuff, settles for the round, and passes the waiter a good fat tip.

In that roll that's flashed there's often more money than some of the poor wrecks in the room have seen in a year. Those not too drunk to comprehend grip the tables in front of them, while beads of perspiration form in the hollows of their hands. Their eyes light up with anger, resentment and hate. But no further sign is given. An attempt to pull anything off on a bunch like that would mean serious trouble "down-town." It's better to wait till they leave the joint, and the men separate into ones and twos after leaving the women.

I've felt all this many times. remember one party in partic ar headed by a fresh young guy ho thought he knew it all. He bega by ordering, in a loud voice, a roun fo the house. He flashed too big a oll Next morning, we read in the pape o a young fellow answering his descri or having been found up-town in a hall ay cleaned out completely and still stupor. He never knew who di it nor did I.

Slumming is not dangerous bus es now, but it's dirty business, thougl I those people who practice it only ev the temptations they stir up, and th ac and bitter memories they quicke i those poor fellows, they would ep away or approach the problem in a ore serious frame of mind.

CHAPTER XV

JUST BEFORE I MADE THE TU

I FOUND a wholly new kind of rl on the Bowery—the lowest dow n dirtiest occupation it is possible t in dertake. It just suited me, and h low-tide condition of manhood I wa in A thief or a "yegg" couldn't be bo h to do it. Most bums would tur u their noses at it, and yet it was o pay. It was strike-breaking— a stuff—and the conditions under w c it was done, and the way we r handled, would sicken a pig. B i didn't sicken me. I liked it. No d with any sense would ask a real ma t do it—they looked up fellows like y self, and we were not a few. It d n require much urging to make me oi the Pinkertons and go out strike-br k ing. My first job was at the big s ke in Philadelphia.

The drunker we got, the less we ed how dangerous was the situation, nd the better our bosses liked it. So ey gave us all the stuff we wanted. We ad quantities of it in the car barns an or the cars themselves. Any time a ll anywhere, we were ready to fight s finish without the slightest ur g That was part of the game, and a what we were brought down to do; nd so long as there was any strike ft there was plenty of booze.

After things had quieted vn sufficiently, we would be paid, and id well, too, and then escorted to the il- road in a bunch and sent back to w York. It would never do for P a- delphia to have us turned loose t e, and it would go badly with each o of us individually if we stayed.

I always got back from a trip ke that with a good-sized roll, and so ng as it lasted, I was busy day and ht drinking and gambling—a never-en ng succession.

McGuirk's Suicide Hall, The Allig or and Nick Solomon's, beside a d en others, became my hangouts. T ey were the hardest and lowest-d vn dives in the city, and I was prob ly the hardest and lowest-down man in he city—again like met like!

It was dangerous business fo a stranger to show a bill in any on of those dumps. I've "rolled" men fo as little as a dollar. When a man's en "rolled," he's been cleaned out of everything that is convertible qui ly into booze and then thrown out the le door into the gutter, probably to e picked up by a cop and arrested or intoxication.

I WONDER how much the pu ic knows about those dives. Very, y little, I fear. At the time of whi I speak, the authorities knew all al ut them. After a big haul the thieves w ld return to these dumps and there di le up with the representatives of the w, who had been tipped off and o had shut their eyes and closed t ir mouths!

I wonder if you realize how t y chase a man's coin? I wonder if ou know what little chance a man ha of coming out of one of these places h much as a nickel left. After one ock in the morning, they used to let sleep all night in the back room if had the price of a drink left. And stuff came then, two hookers to nickel, before daylight. You hadn't hance in the world of holding back ime for a "pad." Many and many a n is forced to "carry the banner"— t is, walk the streets all night. They 't hold the price of a "pad" or even ickel for two of those early morning iks and the privilege of sleeping in back room.

hen it wasn't too cold it was much re desirable to "carry the banner" n to sleep on a "pad" in those rotten, l-smelling ten-cent lodging-houses ch line the Bowery for blocks. They breeding-places of crime, vermin disease. They are everything they uld not be, and not one single ng they should be.

here's big money in it—the way se houses are run. Why doesn't e wealthy man or group of men ip a ten-cent lodging-house with ms, say, for five hundred men? ep it clean and restrict it rigidly to n not drunk. Provide showers with and cold water. I'd guarantee to p it full all the time with honest, er, deserving men, men who would make good if they could find a place where they could sleep clean, and where they would be out of drink's temptation. I know of many cases where men who were off the stuff and putting up a good fight have been awakened by some one in a nearby bunk inviting them to have a drink from an outstretched bottle. What chance has a fellow of quitting the stuff when he is reduced to living in joints of that caliber?

The right kind of a house could be run for ten cents per "pad," and no one would lose a penny—they might even make a little! There certainly must be men, ten of them, who would be willing to form a company and subscribe say twenty-five thousand dollars each for a purpose like that! It's the biggest need of the Bowery to back up and make more effective the rescue work now going on there.

Where are these men? Who are they? Tell me!

How many of your friends or the general public realize that there are fully thirty thousand men in New York City who, though honest and willing to work, can't earn more than seventy-five cents a day? Most of those men are down town, and the problem they present is a difficult one to solve.

Through the Orient

barrassed at this. But in telling of the occurrence, the fine old Confucianist's eyes twinkled and he seemed to have admired his American friend for this brave attempt to win him to his belief.

"One thing I want to make plain is the difference between the Oriental view and the Christian view. The Oriental teaching is: 'Do not do unto others what you would not like to have them do to you.'"

"I wonder if he means by that our treatment of the Japanese in California," I thought.

"The Christian teaching," he continued, "is: 'Do to others what you would like to have them do to you.' Americans should understand not only this difference of viewpoint, but the common end they serve."

"If Baron Shibusawa will permit me," I said, "I should like to remind him that Christ was an Oriental, and that in the life of philanthropy and constructive helpfulness that he is planning, the Baron is making use, not of the Confucian principle of not wronging another, but of the positive Christian principle of active assistance. So that while I understand that he must have been embarrassed, I think that Mr. Wanamaker had actual justification for considering him a man of Christian principles."

As this was translated, a smile covered his face and he chuckled with pleasure at my remark. He followed us to the outer door, and as we parted he shook hands once more and said, "Au revoir." I wish that it might be that way, for Baron Shibusawa is a man whose life of usefulness and integrity makes him worth meeting, and whose frank sincerity makes him a man whom it is a delight to meet.

How Your Experience With Tires Helps Make Goodyears Better

When you buy a set of Goodyear Tires this company is more interested in the way they wear than you are.

You have a few dollars invested, but Goodyear has millions at stake—and leadership.

So any extraordinary fact in your tire experience will be reported to the factory by the Goodyear Service Station man and will be added to hundreds of thousands of other facts about Goodyear Tires in use.

Goodyear engineers examine constantly enormous quantities of old tires, learning how they wore out—to keep Goodyear Tires from wearing out that way. The result of the Great Research is to make Goodyear Tires better and better—a step at a time.

Sincere, intensive study of tire wear has preceded all of the revolutionary Goodyear improvements, such as the Goodyear tire-making machine, Goodyear special pressure-resisting fabric, the On-Air Cure, the All-Weather Tread and the No-Hook Bead with its braided piano wire base.

In this study and improvement of tires, Goodyear uses the work of engineers from fifteen of the world's greatest technical schools and hundreds of practical experts.

So Goodyear Tires, advancing from obscurity to leadership in little more than a decade, are favored now by a plurality of motorists—and one out of every three new cars is Goodyear-equipped.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

A Christmas Gift
That Is a Continuous Reminder of the Giver

A Bissell's Carpet Sweeper or a Bissell's Vacuum Sweeper would make a most sensible and appropriate Christmas gift for wife or mother.

Both are used every day, and would be a daily reminder of your thoughtfulness.

BISSELL'S
Carpet Sweeper — Vacuum Sweeper

Either or both will be highly appreciated. If she has a carpet sweeper she wants the exceptional cleaning qualities of the powerful, easy-running, easy-emptying vacuum sweeper.

Or, on the other hand, remember that the light, handy carpet sweeper has its own distinct field of usefulness, not lessened by possession of a vacuum sweeper. The two make a work saving combination that will bring you the gratitude of the recipient long after some pretty little gift would have been forgotten.

As to prices: The Vacuum Sweepers $7.50 and $9.00. "Cyco" Ball-Bearing Carpet Sweepers $3.00 to $5.50. A trifle more in the West, South and in Canada. Sold by dealers everywhere. Booklet on request.

The Indians of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE Indians of interior Alaska are excited over the building of the government railroad. They see the whites taking up homesteads, and fear they will swallow the country. They know the fate of the Indians of the United States proper, and they want the government to set aside land where their fishing and hunting will not be disturbed. Not long ago the seven chiefs of the tribes of the Tanana and Yukon valleys met at Fairbanks. They came to consult with their friends among the whites, and see if the government could not be induced to give them a reservation. In talking with them Judge Wickersham, the Alaska delegate in Congress, advised them to have their people take out a lot of homesteads in one block. He said it would be difficult for them to do this after the whites had come in, and said they should act promptly. One of the chiefs replied that he thought all of Alaska belonged to the red men, and he wanted to know what the conditions actually were.

These Indians would rather have a large reservation than a number of individual homesteads. They want to live together and keep out the whites. Moreover, they need large tracts for trapping, and the fur business will be wiped out by the division of the land.

Chief Thomas and family do not indicate race suicide in Alaska

The government has been setting aside reservations for the Indians in various parts of Alaska. The Aleutian Islands are practically one reservation. Annette Island, where Metlakahtla is located, is another, and the Hydaburg reservation, consisting of twelve square miles on the western coast of Prince of Wales Island, is a third. The tract of 800 acres on the Chilkat River, not far from Skagway, has been given to the Klukwan Indians, and there are forest reservations where the Indian can trap and hunt at will.

The Indian chiefs who met at Fairbanks to counsel with the whites were remarkable men. They were tall and fine-looking. They wore clothes which were much the same as the whites, save that they had on their ceremonial jackets bordered with fur, and beaded moccasins covered their feet. Each wore a great necklace of beads, which was probably a badge of his chieftainship, and the hair of all was cut short. I have a photograph of the chiefs. Their faces are Mongolian in cast, and several of the men looked much like Japanese. All show great strength of character, and I doubt if a stronger and better-looking body of rulers could be found anywhere. They are of Athapascan stock, and they form a part of that great family of Indians which is scattered throughout northern Canada, extending on into central Alaska. They are about the same as the Navajos and some other Indians of our southwestern states.

The Indians of Alaska are rapidly decreasing in number. They are much fewer than when we took possession of the territory; and in 1910, according to the census, they numbered less than twelve thousand. At that time there were about twenty-five thousand natives, and of those 60 per cent. were Eskimos. The twenty-five thousand were scattered over a territory one-sixth as large as the whole United States and three times the size of either Germany or France. The Eskimos inhabit the region along the coast of the Arctic Ocean and Bering Sea, taking in the deltas of the Yukon, the Kuskokwim and other rivers, and extending down into the Alaskan peninsula. The Indians are found here and there on the mainland and especially in the great plateau of the Yukon. There are some in the Aleutian Islands and about Prince William Sound, and there are a great many along the coast and on the islands of southeastern Alaska.

On my way down the Yukon I saw many of the Athapascans. They have camps near the white settlements, and one sees their salmon wheels along the banks of the rivers, with the fish-drying racks near by. The Indians use fish wheels to catch the winter supply of salmon for themselves and their dogs. The wheels are so made that they are turned by the current. They have great nets attached to them, into which the fish swim and are carried up into the air and dropped into a box, while the Indians sit on the bank and smoke at their leisure. Every few hours the fish are taken out of the boxes. They are cleaned by the squaws and hung on the racks in the sun to dry. They are then taken home and laid away in the cache, or high shed upon poles that stands beside each Indian home. This is to keep them away from the dogs and wild animals. The cache is reached by a ladder and the fish are brought down as needed.

I have been interested in the homes of the Athapascans. They live in substantial log cabins, and many of their houses have frame doors and glass windows. Some of these Indians are now planting gardens, and not a few use cook-stoves and other furniture like that of the whites. The most of them have become Christians, although they retain many of their old superstitions and customs. The government has established public schools in all of the large villages, and the younger generation is learning to speak English.

THE Indians admire the whites and try to imitate them. They are now dressing much the same, except that they delight in bright colors. During my trip we have had a number of Indian men and women with us on the tourist steamers. The Indians watch the whites and try to do as they do. The other day a young squaw sat down at the table opposite two traveling salesmen from Seattle. As the meal went on they noticed that the g orders were the same as their own. was pretending to study the menu, they concluded that she could not and that this was her first experie with the white man's victuals. Th upon, one of them ordered for desse slice of custard pie and winked at friend to do the same. The squaw her turn gave a similar order. W the pie came one of the traveling seized the catsup bottle and sprin a liberal allowance of hot tomato s over his pie. His friend followed and then shoved the catsup across table to the copper-skinned girl. did the same, only more so. The then delayed t eating to w the agony of Indian. The squaw, howe heroically finis her pie wit winking, and, far as any could see, the was on them.

The Metla tla Indians I already descri The proper n for them is T seans. They converted f savages to ci zation by Fa Duncan and t village on Ann Island has cot homes that w be considered c fortable in aln any town of States. The tives dress just the whites, were it not their comple and features, would hardly know they were Indi Outside Annette Island the worl civilization among the Indians has promoted by the missionaries school teachers. The missionaries c first. They had their schools, indus and otherwise, and they converted Indians to Christianity.

After the missionaries came the reau of Education. It has taken ch of the natives of Alaska. The teac are now instructing the adult Indian sanitation and civil government. T are inducing them to establish st and to engage in all possible sustaining industries.

So far the most remarkable prog has been among the Haidas, a trib five or six hundred Indians on Pr of Wales Island. The government given them a reservation, and they b a town there called Hydaburg, whic perhaps the most advanced Indian t of the world. The natives have ganized a cooperative trading comp and are paying big dividends to t stockholders. With only $11,000 vested, within the past three y they have paid dividends of $8, Last year the directors declared a d dend of 50 per cent., and the comp has so increased its stock that it undertake a fish-canning and s milling business.

As it is now, nearly every famil Hydaburg has stock in this tra company, and the people are rap growing well-to-do. Nearly every has his gasoline launch and all h comfortable homes. The town el its own officers. It has a mayor councilmen and the business of place is transacted in English.

The Haidas are not Thlingits. T belong to a different Indian family for a long time their only home se to have been on Queen Charl Island, in British Columbia. La some of them moved to the west c and about 200 years ago, according ir traditions, they drove the Thlingits of a part of Prince of Wales Island settled there. They have always n considered a superior Indian, and e had tho reputation of being the t painters, carvers and canoe builders southeastern Alaska.

he Thlingits are scattered everyre throughout the Alexander archigo and there are tribes that live the mainland. Klukwan is a vil- of the Chilkats, on tho Chilkat er not far from Skagway. The town aid to bo 300 years old and to have e had a population of a thousand ls. Its people were traders, exnging dried fish and oil for furs h the Athapascans of the interior. Chilkats are great trappers. They e divided their hunting grounds ong tho various families, and these its extend from generation to gention. They have been noted for ir skill in the various industries. y wove blankets a century ago. y also forged copper and did beaul carving. Much of this skill has arted with the advent of civiliza, but they now make moccasins and out totem poles and other things the tourists.

he Chilkats are not as advanced as Haidas, but the settlement of Kluk has a cooperative store, which just paid a dividend of 35 per cent. store is so good that it gets much le from the whites, and it is said t the Indians come a distance of a dred miles to buy there. Klukwan has its men's club, which holds meetings every week, at which matters of town interest are discussed. Now the boys are talking of forming a clubhouse, with a reading-room and bath. The reading-room will be large enough to hold meetings in. Magazines will be subscribed for and books added from time to time.

The government is doing all it can to improvo conditions among the Indians. The teachers are cleaning up the towns and the doctors and nurses of the Bureau of Education go from village to village and givo directions for the care of the sick and how to keep the well healthy. It is estimated that 8 per cent. of the deaths are due to tuberculosis. Sanitary camps should be provided and means of preventing the spread of the disease inaugurated.

Alcohol is the great curse of the Indians of Alaska. Its sale is forbidden by law, but nevertheless whisky is sold to tho Indians, and it will continue to bo sold as long as saloons are allowed in the white settlements. Of late there has been a strong prohibition movement, and the probability is that tho territory will sometime vote itself dry. Congress is now appropriating a small amount per year to suppress the liquor traffic among tho Indians, and it has its special employees who aro working to do this, under the direction of the marshals and the police. I am told that the Indians of many localities object to the sale of liquor and that temperance societies have been formed among them.

ternational Convention of the Disciples of Christ

HE annual General Convention of the Disciples of Christ, held at Des Moines, Iowa, in October, attended by delegates from all ts of this country and the foreign sion fields. A spirit of courage and husiasm permeated all the sessions. seven boards whose operations for year were reviewed (Foreign, Home, urch Extension, Benevolence, Eduion, Ministerial Relief, and the man's Board) showed marked adcement over the preceding year, l, in fact, over all the former annual orts. These seven boards received l disbursed last year, $1,841,356.86 a gain over the previous year of 9,070.02 — nearly twenty-five per t.

overnor George W. Clark, in his coming address, sounded the notes of gress, cooperation and loyalty, which ame the keynotes of the convention. e governor is himself a Disciple.

mong the mountain-top visions to ich the convention was led by great lresses, two or three deservo special ntion: Rev. S. G. Innman, Secretary the Panama Conference, thrilled five usand people with his story of tho ation in Mexico. Mr. Innman is a sonal friend of President Carranza, l has had Mr. Carranza at his mission Mexico several times. This distinshed Mexican said to him one day they sat in the mission: "If there had n twenty-five such schools scattered ough Mexico during the last genera- n there would today be no armies in field either in Mexico or the United tes." Mr. Innman declares that the ation does not present a fight to be pped, but a problem to be solved. teenth century conditions prevail re in this twentieth century. He med the United States for exploiting natural resources of the country her than developing her people. erican capitalists have invested 000,000,000 in Mexico, while all testant missionary forces have insted only $2,000,000. One large per concern has a million people in xico dependent on it—or one out of ry fifteen of the population. He d the United States has assigned to y for the troop movements to protect southern border, $130,000,000, and this amount were put into religious d educational work it would place in ry town of four thousand people a urch, hospital, school and social center gnificently equipped, and provide ple workers for ten years, and bees endow the public schools in the nicipalities with $750,000, which uld afford an income larger than the government has paid in any year of its history.

The Men and Millions session was another tremendous meeting. Mr. Robert A. Long, the Kansas City millionaire, presided. The secretaries reported that the task set three years ago to raise $6,300,000 in five years, was making good progress; four millions had been secured, and four hundred thousand had been paid in; there is yet a balance of $2,300,000 to be raised in the next two years. President G. Campbell White made the great address on this occasion. He said if the nations of Europe had been trying to evangelize the world instead of trying to colonize for selfish purposes there would be peace in all the world today. "Canada," he said, "has sent one of every twenty of its subjects to the war. If tho Protestant churches would send one of every twenty members into the foreign field there would now be 1,025,000 missionaries in the world fields." Dr. White said the world is in a fluid state as never before in all its history, and following this world war the churches would face a task that the Christian forces should prepare to meet.

One of the beautiful things was what was called "Iowa Hour" in the women's session of tho convention. At the close of their day's program the leaders of the women's work in Iowa brought a large basket to the platform, and the womon of all the auxiliary societies in the state came bringing their offerings. Each woman in the state had been asked to contribute a special offering of fifty cents. One society having nine hundred members gave a total of $475. The offering amounted to soveral thousand dollars. But the best part of this featuro was the presentation of twenty-eight of the brightest and best of Iowa's sons and daughters, who had consecrated themselves to the cause of missions at home or abroad. At the sight of these young people all hearts rejoiced and all eyes were moist with tears.

But perhaps the climax of the whole convention was reached in the great communion service on Sunday afternoon in the Coliseum, when eight thousand people sat down together at the Lord's Table. No address was delivered. The program containing the detailed directions, with the responsive Scripture readings, was placed in the hands of every person entering the Coliseum. When the time arrived for tho opening of the service every seat was taken and people by the hundreds were standing all about the back of the galleries. About two hundred deacons waited on the congregation with the emblems.

Nothing can be more appropriate than the Bible-Giving Christmas Plan
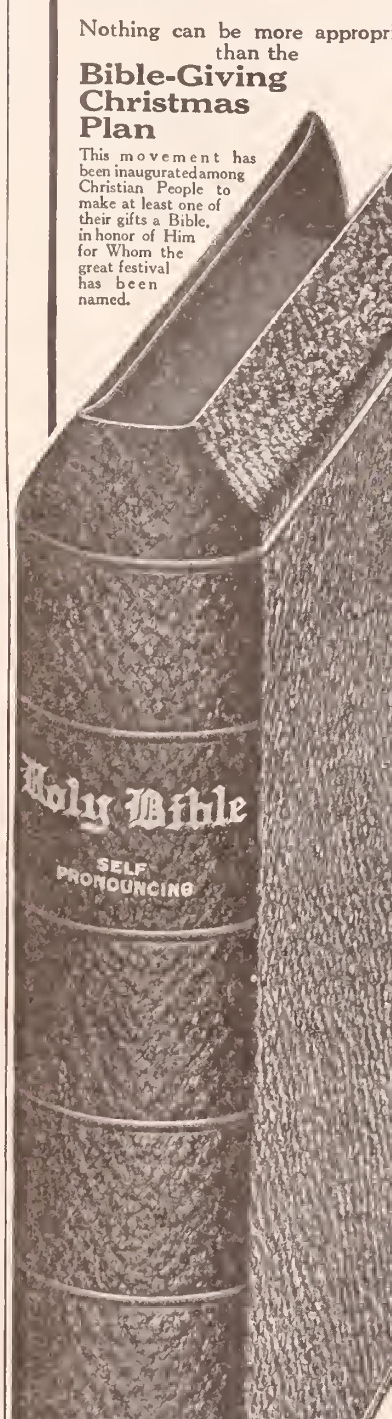
This movement has been inaugurated among Christian People to make at least one of their gifts a Bible, in honor of Him for Whom the great festival has been named.



"INTERNATIONAL"
CLEARNUTYPE
BIBLE
SELF-PRONOUNCING

THIS new Bible represents a distinct improvement over any form in which the Bible has hitherto been issued. In clearness of type, convenience of size, and logical arrangement, it is adapted to every class of Bible readers. It is the newest of the 600 forms in which "International" Bibles are made.

CLEARNUTYPE

While the text of the Bible does not change, new methods of typemaking have produced a type that is larger in size, more easily read, and more restful to the eyes, for use in a book which is also more convenient in size and lighter in weight. The type used in this new Bible was moulded especially for the purpose. It is the largest, clearest type to be found in any Bible of like size.

THE ONE BIBLE THAT IS MOST LIKELY TO PLEASE EVERYBODY In addition to the large clear type and convenient size, the full contents also commend this Bible. It contains the Authorized Version of the Old and New Testaments, with sixty thousand references in the center column; has the names of the books of the Bible printed on outer edge for quick reference; has all proper names accented and divided into syllables, making pronunciation easy; has the most accurate, most usable aids to Bible study; and has seventeen colored maps.

NEW TYPE OF TEACHERS' AIDS TO BIBLE STUDY

The logical arrangement of the helps is another improvement and a great convenience. All the aids (over 400 pages), including Complete Concordance, Subject Index, Dictionary, etc., etc., are under one Alphabetical Arrangement instead of separate headings as in the old type of Bible. Furthermore, these new helps are illustrated and are the only helps printed from black-face type, which makes them more readable and useful.

Handsomely Bound in Flexible Leather

This Bible is printed on thin rag paper especially made for it. Jet black ink is used in the printing to make the type stand forth clearly. Handsome, Flexible Leather Binding, with overlapping covers (like cut), red-under-gold edges, head-band and purple ribbon marker, all combine to make it the finest, most practical of Bibles—the most pleasing of all gifts.

OUR SPECIAL LIMITED-TIME OFFER

A Vision of a Glorious Future

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE closing chapters of Revelation are a glowing anticipation of the final triumph of Jesus Christ, and a beautiful picture of a redeemed humanity when the Lord's prayer is answered, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth." Nothing could be more fitting as the very closing vision of the Bible than this glimpse of a Christian world-order, a society rooted and grounded in love and service. In all ages it has cheered and led forward prophets, martyrs and humblest toilers; for it holds a twofold promise: First of all, a foretaste of that heaven which awaits every true soul, and secondly, an assurance that the Gospel is not a failure, but is to succeed at last in transforming earth into heaven's likeness. It is a picture of Heaven, the home of the soul; but it is also a picture of a City, of human activity and human thought when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ.

The Optimism of the Bible

THE whole Bible is marvelously pervaded by an indomitable conviction that this is God's world, and that despite its sin and pain and darkness, it is no blank or blot, but means intensely and means well. It is a forward-looking Book, a Book of prophecies and promises. Its great characters believed, with Rabbi Ben Ezra, that "the best is yet to be." Its Golden Age is always in the future. Abraham has a promise that in his posterity shall all the earth be blessed, and he goes forth on the great venture of faith. Moses leads the striking brickmakers of Egypt across the painful desert to the Promised Land where justice and righteousness shall be wrought. Isaiah, facing the scourge of war and a great military despotism, foretold the time when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation," nor should they even learn war any more. And Jesus proclaimed the good news of the coming Kingdom of the Spirit which was already "at hand"—a present opportunity then for hearts that responded—and which is ever coming in increasing fulness through all the earth. So John had a vision of a redeemed world and a holy family of the Eternal God, who inhabit the earth as their father's house, and dwell fraternally in him.

The Transformed Earth

THE seer of Patmos declares the revelation of a new environment for the unfolding plan of God. The very heavens are new—not a different cosmos substituted, but a universe differently apprehended, really appreciated. This is the thought of a little hymn that speaks of the sky being brighter and the face of the fields more beautiful since the soul was brought into harmony with Christ. Indeed, since John's day, we have an entirely new conception of the starry vastness. But our lesson goes far deeper than mere physics and astronomy, which some fail to realize. "Behold, I make all things new."

Perhaps we can catch the symbolism best in the interpretation of the abolition of the sea. "There was no more sea." What does it mean? The sea meant separation—exile—to John on that lonely isle. It was a type of destruction, storm and disaster, as well as of isolation. The new world is an order of things when the sea is robbed of its terrors by the exercise of man's God-given mind, but more than that, it is a system when persecution, exile and human misunderstanding shall have passed away forever.

The transformed earth shall have received its organization, its spiritual beauty, from God when the revelation of his will for his church shall have been accepted and put in practice everywhere. God shall indeed dwell with them—the promise of Immanuel, God with us, made complete. They shall be his peoples (plural as in Revised Version), all nations God's peoples, no longer distrust and prejudice and hatred, but fraternity.

Nation with nation, land with land,
  Unarmed shall live as comrades free;
In every heart and brain shall throb
  The pulse of one fraternity.

Infinite comfort and help are there, for God shall wipe away all tears. Yea, rather, pain and sorrow and sin and death shall be done away. "These words are faithful and true." In the mind of Christ, already "they are come to pass."

The Open Gates of the Kingdom

JUST as an oriental city with its walls and gates could be seen from afar in the midst of earth and sky, so here we have the Holy City, the True Church, the Community of the Future, set in the midst of the transformed environment. The description exhausts the stateliest and most gorgeous terms to describe its moral and spiritual excellences. Like the vision of Christ in Chapter 1, this is not a photograph but an allegory. For the city is a perfect cube—as high and wide as it is broad and long. Its walls are jasper, its streets are gold. This seems to mean that it shall be perfectly proportioned, and that its institutions and conveniences shall be sublime, having the light of knowledge, the strength of organization, and the efficiency of cooperation. But even here we are not to think so much of the city as of the people who make up the city, interpreting all finally in terms of character and spirituality. Just so we interpret Katherine Lee Bates's great national anthem, "America."

O beautiful for patriot dream that sees beyond the years, Thine alabaster cities gleam, undimmed
  by human tears.
America, America, God shed his grace
  on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood from sea to shining sea.

John's city of glory is free to all. The gates are open wide. Whosoever will may come. The gates of God are not to keep men out, but to let men in. Heaven is an eternal invitation. Welcome is its watchword even to the prodigal from the far country. In a very true sense we can enter heaven now. Eternal life begins here. The Son of Man was in heaven while in Palestine.

But no man can bring abomination in, nor covetousness, nor fear. Alas that men turn back from the pearly gates hugging to their bosoms their secret sins! Alas that men fail to enter in to the Kingdom because, like the young ruler who came to Jesus, they have great possessions and will not loosen their greedy clutch! But first in the list of those who are disinherited by their own choice are cowards, "the fearful." Christianity means staking all, venturing on faith, launching out on the deep. It is never for the calculating, the self-saving, the petty of soul.

No Temple There

HOW strange to an ecclesiastical mind! John looked forward to the time when there should be no more churches! The spiritual man quickly discerns his meaning. We must never forget that the visible church is a means to an end, and not an end in itself. If men only realized that! The church is not the Kingdom, but it is an agency to bring about the Kingdom. Or, if you prefer to look at it from another angle, when the church is universal and spiritual it will have outgrown temples and creeds and camps. Religion and life will be one. All shall eat of the Building the City

HIS city coming down from God in his revelation of himself to his lren is not to be established by the ing of a magician's wand. It is to uilded by God's servants upon the foundation which he has laid, even is Christ. That which we could do God did. He gave unto us the : foundation there, and on Calvary up the cornerstone of self-sacrifice. for the rest we must "edify," as l used to say; we must build up the of God. It is our inestimable ilege and responsibility. "Let each take heed how he buildeth," Paul . We are fellow builders with ist, "workers together with him."

'e are builders of that city;
All our joys and all our groans elp to rear its shining ramparts;
All our lives are building-stones.

or that city we must labor,
For its sake bear pain and grief;
n it find the end of living
And the anchor of belief.

'here must be Christians ere there be a Christian society. You can't d a cathedral out of clay. Not at t till it has been washed, shaped into n, and passed through the fire. n you have cathedral material, and assemble it into the structure ned. Even so you cannot build 'ity of God out of earthly-minded, and common men and women. re must be Christian experience in individual, there must be Christian racter, redeemed, consecrated, tested not found wanting, before the venly will is done on earth. Yet every true Christian is a center of kingdom-building activity, a leaven working through the lump. Kingdom qualities must be developed and made general, passing from soul to soul. Goodness is contagious.

There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. There are diversities of workings, but the same God who worketh in all. Every faithful religious denomination is needed, but they must learn to work in cooperation. Every type of religious experience can find a place. More is needed than gifts of prayer, but they are needed, too. The man who is tongue-tied in church may be a power for building his city up in Christ. Business righteousness has its urgent task ere the Kingdom be come; and men of consecration in the marts of trade are called for by the Spirit and the Bride. All teachers of youth have a notable opportunity for the building of the future. We must lose our narrow individualistic notions and realize that our righteousness, like Isaiah's, is not for ourselves alone but for our city, our land and the world.

Finally there must be Faith. Not counsels of despair, not weeping Elijahs, but men of vision with "Hope" emblazoned on their shields. The indomitable spirit of the pilgrim and the pioneer, the indefatigable industry of the reformer, the unquenchable idealism of the poet, these are essentials of progress. Faith in God we must have, faith in man as God's child, faith in the practicability of the teachings of Jesus.

It is for each of us who have seen the vision for whose realization Christ died, to believe earnestly that he did not die in vain. Ye too shall strive undaunted if "ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." Though the disciple never see the fulfilment of his toil here below, he may win such an epitaph as this, which the greatest Christian poet desired:

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break, Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph, Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Buddhist Sunday Schools in Japan

HE Buddhists of Japan have been greatly aroused by the success of the Christian Sunday schools, which have been stimu-d to activity through the plans for the World's Sunday School Convention in country. In the last two years there has n an increase of 898 Christian Sunday ols in Japan, with an added enrolment of 53 students.

o offset this Christian advance, the Bud-ts, at the time of the coronation of the peror, dedicated a sum of money, said to a million yen, for the organization of day schools. The abbot of the West gwanji temple issued the order for this ldhist Sunday school movement having ts objective the organization of one new day school every day. Before the corona- there were only seventy Buddhist Sunday ols. By December, 1915, there were 680, n 111,000 children, an increase of 610 day schools in two months. By April, 1916, number had reached 800, with 120,000 dren. The hope is to reach 1,200 schools a registration of 228,000 by April, 1917. 'he Buddhist sect which has been most wn for its imitation of the Christian day school and other Christian methods he Nishi Hongwanji. This sect has a day school board which acts for all Japan. y have copied almost exactly the literature methods of the Christian Sunday school. ir board gives a banner to the best Bud-st Sunday school, and confers medals for cial merit. To the child with the best rd in each Buddhist Sunday school is en the much-coveted privilege of seeing far-famed buildings and treasures of the st Hongwanji temples. This is a red-letter in the life of any Japanese child. They e also issued some books treating of the day school and quoting, for the purpose arousing Buddhists to the importance of religious training of children, from such ristian authors as Professor Butler, Bishop dins, Lesky, Luther, and others. One of se books gives the plan of organization a Buddhist Sunday school, suggesting the ies of superintendent, officers, teachers, sic, drawing, and visiting committees, retary and treasurer. They suggest Cradle Roll, Beginner's, Primary, Intermediate and Senior departments, and a Nurses' Class; also mothers' meetings and days for children corresponding to our Christmas Children's Day, Thanksgiving and Rally Day.

They have copied Christian text cards in a "Life of Buddha," welcome, attendance and birthday cards, getting their ideas from the splendid cards worked out by Rev. K. Mito, the Sunday school genius of the Methodist Church in Japan.

But as Mr. Mito points out, it is in music that the imitation has reached a climax. They have adopted our Christian hymns wholesale, simply substituting the name of Buddha for that of Jesus. Wesley's great hymn, "Oh for a Thousand Tongues to Sing," is copied almost word for word. "Jesus Loves Me, This I Know," the song best known in the Orient, is published as a part of the Buddhist song book. "Bringing in the Sheaves" and "God Is Love," modified slightly for their purposes, are also appropriated.

Buddha is referred to in their stories frequently as the "Heavenly Father." The boldness of imitation is shocking. They seek in their stories to glorify the Christian virtues and the heroic deeds of the Japanese; but there is lacking those motives for character-making which spring from the personal indwelling of Christ. They have gone on the assumption that, if certain machinery is used, certain results must follow, losing sight of the fact that the love, example and Christian devotion of the Sunday school teacher is the real force in making a character.

A Buddhist priest once said to a missionary, "We have no love in our religion. Christianity has. You will therefore succeed."

And all this is the stranger because the Buddhists heretofore have taught that young children and women have no souls, and they have consequently been neglected. Now they are quoting from authors who speak of Methodism's work in Europe, beginning among the children.

The imitation of Christian methods is a great, though an undesigned, compliment to the work of the missionary and the native church. An interesting fact is that the Buddhist sect, which is most active in this imitation, has, as one of its teachings, a belief in the coming of a redeemer who is to save from sin.

The Old-Fashioned Woman, the Business Girl, and Marriag

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"THANK the stars!" said the Boy shortly, "that there are still some real old-fashioned women left in the world!"

The Girl looked at him quizzically before she answered.

"Just what do you mean," she questioned, "by a real old-fashioned woman?"

I was sitting behind them in the train, and, quite frankly, I listened. For trains are sometimes stupid things, and the conversation began in a promising way.

"What do you mean," questioned the Girl, "by an old-fashioned woman?"

"The woman whose only ambition in life is to get married and make a home!" answered the Boy emphatically. "The woman who doesn't know or care anything about the outside world. The woman who doesn't want to have a career—to work for a living. The woman who doesn't know how to earn a living. That's what I mean!"

The Girl laughed openly as she presented her commutation ticket to the conductor. I grew even more interested. A commutation ticket stamps one as a worker. And a business girl's opinion on such a subject—

"Then you don't approve—" the Girl's voice broke abruptly into my train of thought—"of the woman who works? You don't approve of the girl who goes outside of her home life for her ideas?"

"Well," answered the Boy largely, "no, I can't say that I do!"

"Then you think," continued the Girl, "that a home should keep a woman so busy that she has no time for anything else?"

"I shall want my wife," said the Boy, "to have no interests outside of the home. I shall represent that side!"

And then, in the silence that followed, the train stopped at my station and I left them sitting there. And as I went home through the early winter dusk, I pondered on their problem. For it is a problem, particularly nowadays, when many girls are self-supporting.

THE greatest profession for a woman is—has always been—homemaking. And, despite anything, homemaking is a profession. It requires as much care and thought and interest as any position in any office. It requires as much planning as the writing of any novel. It requires as much talent as the painting of any picture.

Not many years ago the average woman was educated with a certain aim in view. That aim was matrimony. She was educated to do nothing more definite than to keep a house neat and play hostess rather prettily. And yet sometimes she never married, and sometimes—

I was talking to a woman yesterday who had been educated in the old school. She was an old-fashioned woman. And marriage had been her one ambition. When she was still very young the right man came along and she did marry.

And then, four years later, her husband died suddenly and she was left practically penniless, with two small boys to bring up. Having been interested all her life in nothing but her home, she was absolutely unfitted to take up the burden of supporting herself and her children.

"If my husband," she told me sobbingly, "had only known how terrible the way would be for me! If he had only known!"

But he didn't know. He had been perfectly happy with his wife—his wife who had no interests outside of the home! He had never thought that it was necessary for her to be able to support herself. "Why," he had said, "it gives me pleasure to know that she is depending absolutely on me!"

You see, he had no idea that he would die—that he would leave her with no one to turn to. But he did die, and years went by before she made good!

SOME folks say the business g

she is apt to be a bit tiresome, a

Four Famous Trains -- and the Famous Watch That Times Them

It's just as easy for you to have accurate time as it is for these railroad men. It's easier in fact, for your watch doesn't get the constant vibration their watches have to stand.

Railroad men and jewelers will endorse the Hamilton Watch—every Hamilton. There are no low-grade Hamiltons—no Hamiltons with less than 17 jewels—no Hamiltons that are not accurately adjusted before leaving the factory—no Hamiltons that are not guaranteed to give complete satisfaction to the user. The combines the supreme qualities — accuracy, beauty and durability. Remember this when you buy a watch.

Hamilton Watch

Over 75% of the value of a fine watch movement is invisible. It is the time and care and skill employed in putting it together, and in making the minute final adjustments, that constitute the difference between a fine watch movement and one which merely looks like it.

The story of the Hamilton will enable you to appreciate the good points of a high-grade watch. It will give you an accurate knowledge of what to look for in buying.

The Conditions to Answered Prayer

Epworth League Topic. Dan. 10 : 12;
11 : 5–10; James 5 : 16

SHALL we limit God? Can we think of as being held back by conditions from answering of prayer? Does he not love Does he not know, before we ask, of wha have need?

It would be well in preparing this lesso read also all of the tenth chapter of Da preceding the lesson reference. Daniel's pr was answered after he had prayed and fa for three whole weeks. Daniel sought munion with his God; he sought to c near to Jehovah, to penetrate the veil of infinite; and when Daniel was ready in h and in mind, God came near to him in person of His messenger and spoke to There were conditions that separated Da from the answer to his prayer, but they conditions that limited Daniel, not God. is promised that the pure in heart shall see The man of impure heart must pray therefore, for cleansing; and then, whe is certain that his heart is purged of dros may seek the vision of the Father. Then the condition implied in the second refer is the imperative need. Why should we ru God for boons which are within the rang our own achievement? When we have str and have not attained, God's arm will found ready to lead us on and his h waiting to give. And again, how can w healed unless we acknowledge our faults shortcomings and cast them before the a of forgiveness? There are conditions determine the answers to our prayers, but are born of our human sinfulness.

THE work of Mrs. Almira Steele among colored children of the South is known to many Christian Herald reac Mrs. Steele, many years ago, founded an phanage in Chattanooga, at which a very l number of colored children have been trai to useful manhood and womanhood. La a concerted effort was made to discredit work, and statements were circulated by enemies reflecting on the management, sanitation, the food and the general chara of the institution. A number of Chattanoog including people of influence and social p tion, who knew of the excellent work done Mrs. Steele, took up the cudgels in defense. An impartial investigation was h at which many of the best citizens in Cl tanooga were present. All the charges v thoroughly sifted, and Mrs. Steele welcor the most rigid inquiry. The result of investigation is the complete vindication the aged worker and of the Home she foun and which she has so lovingly and efficie conducted. The outcome promises to highly beneficial to the work, as it not o clears the atmosphere of detraction antagonism, but has shown the Home to worthy of popular support, and it will have more friends and supporters than e

The Truth About Poultry

Get the Facts by Reading

The One-Man Poultry Plant

Successful Methods of Men on Farms or Small Acreage

Complete in twelve parts; printed in one volume

By DR. N. W. SANBORN

REAL work, with real poultry, on a real New England Farm. This is a simple story of what has been done by a man, at forty-five years of age, town bred and city educated, getting out of practice of medicine, buying a small farm in the hill country, and making a success of the venture. Not only is the rearing of chicks and the management of adult fowl completely covered, but the interesting side issues of fruit growing, grain raising and the production of milk, that cannot be escaped on a real farm. You get rugged facts — rarely found in print. The truth about poultry as found in actual life on a one-man poultry farm.

against the amendment said as the two workers left him. "Vell, I dell you, poys, I come dis far. I von't vote eider vay." He kept his promise. Another farmer, who had been counted doubtful at the best, greeted in a most unexpected way the three workers who approached him. He was a big, sturdy giant, and out in the field picking corn. As the crew from the Federation came toward him, headed by a stocky business man, whose flushed face belied his habits, the farmer stopped his team, squared himself around, assumed a defiant attitude, and cried: "Come on, boys. Come on and talk to me all you want to. But I tell you right now, no matter what you say and what you promise, I'm going to vote her dry."

The cause had some giants supporting it. Chief among them was W. J. Bryan. This man, who had been three times candidate for the presidency, threw his avoirdupois of body and spirit into the ballot without reserve. Mr. Bryan contributed his assistance not without difficulty and unpleasantness. In Omaha the "wets" engaged the auditorium and all down-town theaters not otherwise occupied for the ten days preceding November 7, for no other reason than to shut him out. They adopted this policy though they had to leave their great halls dark more than half the time. The mayor, however, granted permission for a street meeting, and the man who had made it a rule for twenty years to conclude the presidential campaign with an address in the auditorium in Omaha on the Saturday evening before election, spoke this time in the street instead

The worst experience of his entire campaign occurred at Blue Hill, a village in Webster. A tremendous crowd gathered here, as elsewhere throughout his trip. Although there were many in the audience sympathetic to him, the majority were apparently hostile. He was heckled shamefully. All sorts of vulgarisms were hurled at him. For a time it appeared that even this master of audiences would not be able to obtain a hearing. Mr. Bryan ceased his efforts to take a glass of water. Some one near at hand yelled—"Grape juice!" "Yes, grape juice," was the rejoinder; "but grape juice does not send you home drunk, to beat your wife, and make her sue for divorce." The random shot struck home. The heckler turned to his neighbor in the crowd, asking, with an oath, "Who told him about me?" For that man had gone home drunk, beaten up his wife, and on the face of the too certain facts the court had granted a separation to the latter.

Not only is Nebraska dry, but like word comes from Montana, northwest; South Dakota, directly north; and Michigan, pioneering eastward. Kansas has been prohibition territory for thirty-four years; North Dakota for a shorter period; Oklahoma wrote it into her constitution when she adopted statehood. The Canadian provinces to the north are already in the prohibition band-wagon. So now there is a wide white line in this longitude from the north pole to Texas. Only the latter state blocks the way of progress to the Gulf. The Lone Star State has been temporarily stolen from us, but she will soon be made white again. Then the few states west of the Mississippi which are still recalcitrant will get into line, and the Great West, which was in the past a synonym for lawlessness, will be solid prohibition territory.

A Universal Christmas Present

THERE is just one hard thing about Christmas, and that is the choosing of presents to give to all sorts and conditions of friends and relatives. A universal present, something that cannot help but fit any person, would be a great help indeed.

We suggest that the Christian Herald is just such a universal Christmas gift. The price certainly is reasonable, it takes but a moment to select it, and no time at all to send it. The very announcement on Christmas morning that the Christian Herald is coming for the year magnifies the worth of the present fifty-two times.

To readers of the Christian Herald no argument is needed to show its special worth as a Christmas gift. You will find a whole page announcement elsewhere in this issue, and by it you will see that in subscribing for the Christian Herald as a gift for a friend not now a subscriber, you may also receive for yourself or have sent to some other friend one of many excellent books, all for the one price of two dollars. If you make such a gift subscription we will allow you to avail yourself of these special offers made for new subscriptions.

A beautiful card, with a message by Rev. J. H. Jowett, will be sent from this office to the person you subscribe for, announcing the gift of the Christian Herald for 1917 from you.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"Bless the Lord, O my soul! . . . He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills. They give drink to every beast of the field; the wild asses quench their thirst. By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches."

Among all creation man alone prays. Faith is universal. All living things expect and receive their food and drink and shelter; or, lacking either, search on until they find it. Man alone doubts. The full faith of the creatures of the field and forest shames our doubtings and points the way heavenward and Godward. There has come recently out of the war new evidence of this faith of little creatures in the all-covering care of the Creator. An American doctor tells of thirty-five species of birds whose nests he had found in the ruins of buildings and trenches in the war-torn fighting area, and of seeing birds nesting in woods which were under shell-fire, going on about their business in spite of the shattering of nesting-places and the crashing of bombardments.

David prayed to the God whose loving care he saw in every spring and stream and drinking beast, and David's psalms ring with the assurance of faith that was certain and that would not be denied.

But there are psalms of praise that rise today from grateful hearts, and David's songs are resung by an innumerable company who today bless the Lord, their faith strengthened by swift answers to prayer.

Miss V. M. writes a rejoicing letter, praising God for the complete recovery of one who had been pronounced incurable, who had suffered long, and for whom prayer has been made by the Prayer League. She says: "We thank you for your intercessory prayers. What comfort and joy they bring the anxious heart!"

A Mother writes thanking God and the prayers of her Christian friends of the League for the return of a son from whom she had had no word in nine years.

Mrs. A. P. B. tells of the healing by prayer of a member of her family who had suffered for over seven years with paralysis.

Mrs. N. J. C. thanks the Lord that her boy got work a few days after she had told the Prayer League of his fruitless search.

Mrs. G. M. S. tells of another victory of grace over that archdemon that enslaves so many, soul-destroying liquor. A young man who was in the grip of this terrible habit was made the subject of prayer on October 1, and on November 15 she was able to write that he had been gloriously reclaimed and was planning to give his life to Christian service. She writes: "To God be all the glory. May he greatly bless you in the ministry of intercession."

Another mother, Sarah J. A., writes of the healing of her son, who had been stricken with tuberculosis, and who is now entirely recovered in health, restored to his work and reunited with his family. She cries, "God be praised. He alone has done it all." Then she asks the prayers of the League that this son may be spiritually healed, that he may know God in his fulness and lovingly obey him; and she asks prayer for her family that all discord may be harmonized, and for herself that she may know God as an abiding presence in her heart, abiding in such fulness that self may be completely cast out.

Mrs. M. C. J. asks the prayers of the League for the healing of a friend who is grievously afflicted, who, when in health, was faithful in her Christian service and who now in affliction is nobly bearing her burden, yet praying that, if it be His will, it may be lifted.

Mrs. C. F. W. writes that, though she is eighty years of age and an invalid, confined in a wheel chair and suffering greatly from an injured hip and leg, she can still read. She says she enjoys the weekly visit of the Herald, would like to join the Prayer League, and would enjoy hearing from any of the League. Any letters addressed in care of the Prayer League will be forwarded.

Mrs. Ida S. S. asks the League to pray for a friend who before her conversion was divorced and remarried, her first husband being now alive. The joy of her Christian life is turned to sorrow by the fear that she is not living according to Scripture. She is greatly burdened; the sweetness of Christ is turned for her into the bitterness of doubt. She tries to serve God acceptably, yet fears that she is being damned by sin; but she does not know what to do nor how to begin. Mrs. S. asks the prayers of the League that this friend may find peace, and that the present husband may be converted. Mrs. S. asks also for prayers for her own complete recovery from a nervous breakdown three years ago, the influence of which she still feels.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Wallace, Idaho; Shippensburg, Pa.; Kensington, Ga.; Nutterville, W Va; Yelton, Okla.; Chicago, Ill.; Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada; Elma, Wash.; Danville, Ky.; Lawrence, Pa.; Danville, Ill.; Redding, Calif.; Burlington, N. C.; Dalton, Mass. (that many may be saved during revival); New Concord, Ohio (that souls may be saved during revival); Franklin, Ohio (pray for God's blessing on revival here); McPherson, Kan. (that coming revival may be a success); Merrillan, Wis. (in the M. E. Church); Cedar Keys, Fla. (that many may be saved during revival); Mrs. G. E. A. asks prayer for a genuine revival of religion in the Baptist churches at Warren, Denmark, Charleston, and Hillsboro, Iowa; Pueblo, Colo. (in the Baptist Church); Dayton, Ohio (in the High Street U. B. Church); Munden, Kan. (that many may be saved during revival).

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; two wives, their husbands; fifteen friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives, friends or themselves.

Mrs. N. C. W. asks prayer that mother's, daughter's and own sight may be restored; a friend, that child's sight may be restored; thirteen friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Eleven parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; six wives, their husbands; ten, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Mrs. M. P. asks prayer that husband may be cured of the drug habit.

E. M. B. R. asks prayer that son may be saved and return to his loved ones; Mrs. W. W. asks prayer that son and wife may be saved; twenty-nine parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; seventeen wives, their h bands; fifty-eight, for the conversion of ot relatives or friends.

Ten readers ask prayer for special spirit blessing for others.

Ninety-four ask prayer for the healing friends or relatives, including Miss M. A. that a friend may be cured of cancer; anoth Mrs. A. P., that daughter may be cured abscesses on face; another, A. C. M., that s may be cured without an operation; six three friends, for healing for themsel Seven friends ask prayer for restoration hearing for themselves or others.

Thirty-seven ask prayer for help or guida in financial affairs, including Mrs. D. B. that funds may be raised to finish chu building.

Forty-five friends ask prayer for the gra ing of varied desires and needs.

Reports of Various Activities

At the annual meeting of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago held lately, Henry P. Crowell was reelected president and Edward K. Warren and Dr. James M. Gray were elected to serve with him on the executive committee. The enrolment in the classes was 1,717 and in the correspondence department 3,996, making a total of 5,713. Twenty-two denominations were represented, thirty-nine different states and thirty-two foreign countries. Twelve students left for the foreign field, and there are now some fifty-seven in the Student Volunteer Band. The net cost of carrying on the work was $176,943.50.

The Society for Social Advance of Baltimore, Md., suggest a national "Stay-on-the-Farm" campaign to persuade young people to remain on the farm. Once-fertile fields and farms are being abandoned in the mad rush to the city, and the loss of young folks has caused many a prosperous farmer to give up his farm work. Country churches which once enjoyed a large attendance are being closed up for want of a congregation. It may be that conditions will eventually equal those of the first week of the creation, when "there was not a man to till the ground" (Gen. 2:5).

For the fiscal year 1915–1916 the work of the American Baptist Publication Society is summed up as follows: Missionaries and workers 191, families visited 159,575, prayer meetings held 9,348, sermons and addresses given 30,909, conversions 9,323, baptisms 2,524, churches organized 37, Sunday-schools organized 218, books sold 50,404, books given away 10,507.

The New York Bible Society records the distribution of 320.715 volumes of the Scriptures during the last twelve months. The Society has furnished the Scriptures in fifty-three languages and in raised type for the blind. Many thousands of Scriptures were given to immigrants and to seamen on vessels in the Harbor of New York. The Society has supplied two hundred institutions in the metropolis with the Bible. More than one hundred missionaries have helped to carry on the work.

DELICIOUS-
CHOCOLATE CREAM DROPS

Soak ½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine in 2 tablespoonfuls cold water 5 minutes. Mix 2 cups granulated sugar and ¼ teaspoonful cream of tartar together; add ½ cup cold water and boil until syrup is clear. Stir soaked gelatine through syrup quickly and turn in a pan to cool, but do not scrape pan. When partially cool add 1 teaspoonful peppermint (scant measure) or vanilla, and beat until creamy and stiff enough to form in centres. Place small pieces of confectioners dipping chocolate over hot water until melted. Remove and drop centres one at a time into chocolate and place on paraffine paper.

This year make candy for home use or put up gift boxes for your friends. Here are two good candy recipes. There are many more in our book, as well as recipes for Jellies, Desserts, Salads, and a wholesome, easily digested CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING, which would be a treat for your Christmas dinner.

CHRISTMAS DAINTIES

Soak 2 envelopes Knox Acidulated Gelatine in 1 cup cold water 5 minutes. Add 1½ cups boiling water. When dissolved, add 4 cups granulated sugar and boil slowly for 15 minutes. Divide into 2 equal parts. When somewhat cooled, add to 1 part ½ teaspoonful of the Lemon Flavoring found in separate envelope, dissolved in 1 tablespoonful water, and 1 tablespoonful lemon extract. To the other part add ½ teaspoonful extract of cloves, and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; turn out and cut into squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavors and colors, and adding chopped nuts, dates or figs.

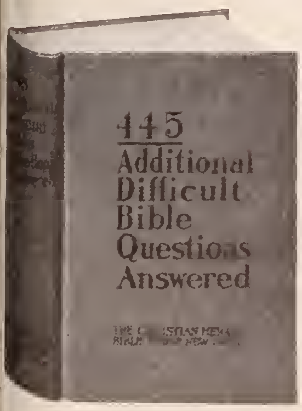
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES



WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

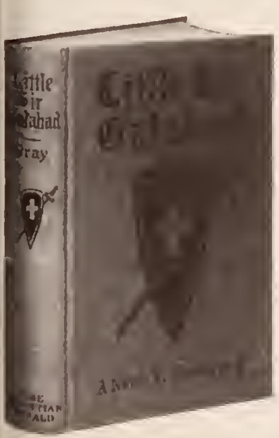
"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

A STORY FOR THE FAMILY CIRCLE

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD



LITTLE SIR GALAHAD is a boy every bit as wonderful and with as high ideals as those of the ancient Knights, but he is an up-to-date hero and a very real little personage, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and, together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence, he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story.

"Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Lem Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate. There is much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story.

We will send "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

40,000 BEAUTIFUL QUOTATIONS

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. It was a remarkable compilation, and it was used largely in public as well as private libraries.

In the course of time, the edition of this book became exhausted. We had so many inquiries for the work that we have republished it, thoroughly revised.

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of today, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to accomplish that result.

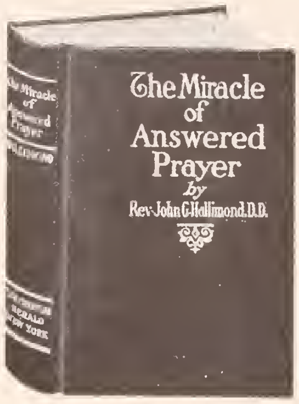
We will send "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.

THE MIRACLE OF·ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D.D.

A Book With a Message for Every Soul



THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

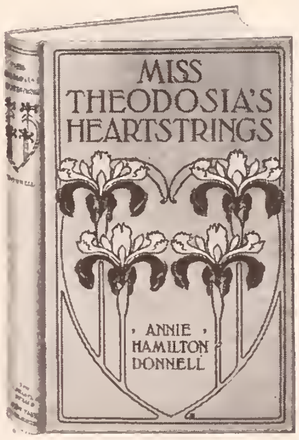
"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands of every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish absolute evidence of the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to his followers: "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name He will give it you." "Ask, and it shall be given you. . . ."

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time now—of answered prayers, all of which are presented in the name of Jesus, and submitted to the Divine Will. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

THEODOSIA'S HEARTSTRINGS



IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. What she found was a very much surprised child who was holding a baby on the small area of her knees. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest of the Flagg children, and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style. The thousands who have read her story about a little girl named Rebecca Mary, in the popular book bearing that title, will be all the more ready to love the irrepressible Evangeline, the ambitious Stefena, and the diminutive Elly Precious.

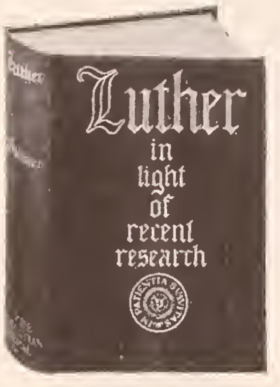
"Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings" is a book that no one who loves children can resist; the little Flaggs are a constant delight.

We will send a copy of "Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

MARTIN LUTHER ANNIVERSARY BOOK

"Luther in Light of Recent Research"



WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has had the work translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book, which should be read by every Protestant in America, is supplemented by a series of eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

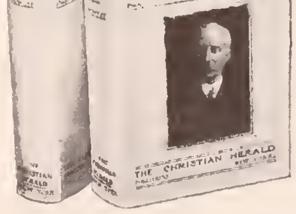
We will send the "Life of Luther," handsomely bound in cloth, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.75.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.

TWO BOOKS BY A FAMOUS PASTOR

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.

DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein, and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.



The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands, as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarefied atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of each volume to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Worth Passing On

BISHOP FRANK W. WARNE of the M. E. Church, in a little booklet, "India's Mass Movement," gives this beautiful story of simple faith; but of faith that was still sufficient to bring the peace of Christ to the heart of a simple old woman, who had lived among ignorance and hopelessness in one of the hundreds of Indian low-caste villages:

SHE had never had any idea of God except what she had gained from the idolatrous teachings and practices which were all about her. She had never committed anything to memory in all her life, and the one thought of her life was to work hours enough to keep from starvation. Our Christian catechist had come to her village, and at night when the work of the day was over had taught the people the Lord's Prayer. She had listened to the explanations and after much effort she had committed to memory the first clause. "Ai hamare Bap jo asman per hai" (Our Father who art in heaven). It had opened to her an entirely new world of thought and imagination and hope, and had satisfied her hungry heart. She had heard the explanations, and now, instead of going to a dead idol, she prayed to a living, loving God, who was her Father—a Father who had so loved her that he had sent his only Son, who had died for her and was risen and had gone back to heaven to prepare a place for her, and would come again and receive her unto himself. What more did she want? It had satisfied all her longings for this life and the next, and in the newness and freshness of these great and wonderful truths the poor old soul was having in her humble village a heaven on earth.

"Our Father who art in heaven" was all she could recite before the catechist, but when he pressed her to go on and learn the next clause, "Hallowed be thy name," she took no interest. When pressed hard, out of the simplicity of her new faith and the joy of her heart she answered "Kya zarurat hai?" that is, "What is the necessity? What more do I want?" A Father in heaven for a poor village woman, a home in heaven where there will be no want nor tears nor pain forever—"What is the necessity of my learning more?" Time and eternity were all provided for in these few words, "Ai hamare Bap jo asman per hai."

Among the Workers

DR. MARY MILLS PATRICK, president of the Constantinople College for Girls, returned to New York on November 13. According to Dr. Patrick, this school has increased in attendance throughout the years of war. The new buildings on the European side of the Bosphorus were completed in 1914 and were in process of construction during the Turkish war with Italy, and during both Balkan wars. The enrolment this year has reached 400, most of the girls being residents of Constantinople. The college has succeeded in protecting the Armenian girls in its student body. Last year, of 290 girls in the College and Preparatory Departments, 63 were Turks, 102 Armenians, 26 Bulgarians, 62 Greeks, and there were also Russians, Persians, Italians, Albanians, Americans and Jews.

MR. KENNETH M. GOULD, graduated in June, 1916, by the University of Pittsburg, has succeeded to secretaryship in the Missionary Education Movement, formerly held by Rev. Morris W. Ehnes, who resigned. A new secretaryship has been created in New England which will be filled by the Rev. Frederick H. Means, formerly of the Congregational Church of Madison, Maine. The new secretary will be especially charged with the organization of the Missionary summer conferences at Silver Bay, N. Y., and at Ocean Park, Me.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR is very much alive in Dixie, chiefly because a large number of consecrated young people are working at it. A thirteen-year-old member of the Presbyterian Intermediate Christian Endeavor Society at Tarboro, N. C., made a visit to a country community near by last summer. She talked up Christian Endeavor wherever she went and organized a Union Christian Endeavor Society of fifty-seven members with members in it from churches of four denominations.

EVANGELIST J. WILBUR CHAPMAN was operated upon in New York early in November for intestinal trouble. He was reported somewhat improved on the day following the operation, from which he did not rally quickly because of his weakened condition.

THE organization which represents all of the churches and reform societies of Chicago in the campaign for a "dry" city has set the spring of 1918 as the time when they expect to vote the saloon out of the second city on the continent. The campaign for this winter was started at the La Salle Hotel in Chicago on October 16.

"No Advance in Prices"

THE name Lipton has always been a guarantee of the finest tea grown; of careful blending; of uniform taste that never varies from package to package, or from year to year; of full rich flavor and full strength that make for real economy.

With the world's tea markets upset, with advanced prices on most other brands; with bulk tea, always an uncertain, unsatisfactory and expensive method of buying tea, now even worse, this message of no advance on Lipton's Tea is doubly important, an added reason for buying Lipton's Tea if you are not already doing so.

Our vast resources as the world's largest growers of tea and our world-wide organization are the reasons why we have been able to maintain prices thus far. We shall continue this policy as long as we possibly can—because we believe it is good business to protect the millions of consumers of Lipton's Tea rather than to take advantage of a situation which might justify us, and has forced others to raise prices.

The quality of course will never vary.

Questions and Answers

INQUIRER, Nuncia, Mich. 1. What is the meaning of Luke 12 : 8, "I say unto you, Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God." Does this verse establish the confessional?

1. The Scripture is very clear on the subject of confessing Christ before men. (See Matt. 10 : 32, 33.) It is the duty of a Christian to confess Christ whenever a fitting opportunity arises. He who neglects this duty misses a great deal of the joy that comes to the soul and the life of the whole-hearted believer, "who is not ashamed to own his Lord." In our church relations, we confess him to the world every time we partake of the sacrament. But a loyal disciple will not be satisfied with this, but will in many ways make his allegiance known to others. 2. Confession of sins is also a duty. We are told to confess them to "one another" (James 5 : 16); that is, to take counsel with experienced Christians who are farther along the road than ourselves, and whose prayers and advice will help and strengthen us. This does not mean the "confessional," in which the tale of sin is poured into the ears of a priest. If we have wronged some one, we should confess our error to him and ask forgiveness. Then there are faults, possibly trivial, that affect no one but ourselves, and these should be confessed to God alone, in our own chamber, when we are unburdening our heart in prayer and asking his forgiveness, possibly for much graver shortcomings. (Your other questions are controversial.)

Earnest Inquirer, Weissport, Pa. Moses, during his youth and early manhood, was educated in "all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7 : 22). According to Manetho, he was trained as a priest at Heliopolis, and the same writer and others believe that he was taught the whole range of Egyptian, Assyrian and Chaldee literatures. Consequently he must have had access to whatever those literatures contained concerning the world, its origin and development and its various peoples. Later in life, he had opportunity for cultivating a knowledge of Arabian science and philosophy. Thus his religious and secular education must have taken a wide range. His whole intellectual and spiritual equipment was so remarkable that even the Egyptians held him as either divine or divinely inspired. His writings, as we find them in the Bible, bear so little resemblance to any earlier literature of which the world today has knowledge, that they can only be explained as the result of divine inspiration. His call, his subsequent career in the founding of a great nation, his wonderful code of laws, his leadership of an untrained people out of a land of idols, slavery and sin to liberty and enlightenment—these the majority of Bible commentators regard as absolute evidence of inspiration, and that he was God-instructed and God-led through it all.

R. L. B., Erie, Pa. We have not the information desired.

A. C. H., Elizabethtown, Pa. "U. B." as applied to submarines, means "Underseaboat," being rendered literally from the German—"Unterseeboot."

Seeker after Truth, Nebraska. 1. In the Lord's Prayer Jesus gave a model for Christians everywhere. We are to ask our Father in heaven for all that we need, praying that, if it be his will, it may be granted. Further, the Saviour told his disciples that their requests should be made of the Father in his (Jesus') name, and that the Father would hear and answer those who prayed in faith. 2. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," is the way of salvation, and it is the only way. He has paid the debt for all who come repentant, renouncing sin and accepting him as Saviour, and being willing to submit to the divine will in all things. This involves prayer and submission, earnest desire and effort to follow Christ's teachings in our daily lives, and confession of him before men. 3. Salvation would be incomplete if only the sins born in us through Adam were forgiven, and if we had to fight the hard battle with evil in our own daily lives. The pardon granted to the repentant sinner is full and free. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." And not only is the cleansing thorough, but if we ask, we shall graciously receive strength to keep us day by day, so that we are enabled to overcome temptation.

Mrs. M. C., Herrin, Ill. The community condition of the early church, as described in Acts 2 : 44–46, was but the outward expression of the new sense of Christian unity which they had begun to experience, and which, as one commentator writes, "melted down all selfishness and absorbed even the feeling of individuality in an intense and glowing realization of spiritual oneness." Some authorities hold, however, that it is not clear that the narrative in Acts implies out-and-out communism, involving an absolute community of all goods and the complete surrender of ownership of all possessions, but rather the dedication of a certain part. These authorities hold that those who were rich shared with others less fortunate. Further, they point to the fact that no precept is given in Scripture indicating complete renunciation, but the fact is recorded that the early disciples were indifferent to property, unselfish, and "willing to communicate." The principle of communism seems never to have been a part of church discipline. There are, however, eminent scholars who take the other view, holding that the story in Acts implies absolute communism, and that it was in practice in the infant church at Jerusalem, although they are willing to admit that it was short-lived, and that there came a time when the experiment was modified, and the well-to-do disciples were required to "distribute," though not to strip themselves altogether of property, which would leave them with nothing to give. Still another view on the subject is that there was undoubtedly a rule in the infant church under which all who engaged in the ministry, or in the spiritual work of the church—even including the female catechists or deaconesses—were pledged to the rule of community of goods. A fourth class of critics have tried to explain matters by the claim that the whole system was voluntary, and not the result of any rule or command. Yet, even in the face of all these learned opinions, the fact seems to be made very clear in Acts that the spirit and practice of the young church were essentially communistic.

Gray Wolf

By Ida L. Reed

DON'T talk to me of Christmas!
The gray wolf's at the door,
Close crouched with fangs a-gleamin';
He knows he's got me shore.
Don't mock my pain by tellin'—
It's all too hard to bear—
Of gifts to others flowin'
And joys I cannot share.

Don't talk to me of Christmas!
Your words but stab and sting
My heart already breakin'—
For me no joy-bells ring.
'Cause mine has been the burden,
And tasks that never cease;
The toil unpaid that crushes
Till death alone brings peace.

Don't talk to me of Christmas!
The gray wolf's at the door;
I'm sick, and poor, and lonely,
And I can toil no more.
I've done my best to brighten
Life's road for others— See?
There's Christmas joy for many,
But the gray wolf waits for me.

W. H. W., an 83-year-old subscriber of York, Pa., sends this morning grace: "Our heavenly Father, we thank thee that our lives have been spared through another night, and that, through thy loving-kindness, we are permitted to see the light of another day in peace and health. Accept our thanks for this food; make us ever grateful for the comforts of this life; sanctify them to our bodies and souls; be thou with us throughout this day; fit and prepare us for its duties; guide and direct us by thy Holy Spirit in the way of all truth; be thou with us through life, and in death own and save us. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen."

E. W. C., Rochelle, Ill., and M. R. H., Flemington, N. J. See answer in the Mail-Bag of November 8.

Mrs. S. W., Keene, N. H. The apparent conflict between I John 1 : 8 and 3 : 9 has been fully discussed in our "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered." We can here say briefly that the misunderstanding may be avoided by remembering that John has in mind the two natures in man, the unregenerate and the regenerate. The one may sin, the other may be said to be sinless because sin is entirely foreign to it, and any dereliction is so entirely involuntary that it cannot be said to have been an act of the higher nature. Regarding the other part of your question dealing with the alleged statement of a religious teacher, we may say that God has other means of grace besides the Lord's Supper whereby he calls, enlightens and saves.

Mrs. S. R. S., Chautauqua, N. Y. There are many who hold that by this war God is punishing the nations of Europe for their past evils. We are not to judge, however, but to bow to the divine will, which in time will make it plain.

B. J., Foxboro. Please explain Matt. 11 : 12. This passage may be rendered: "The kingdom of heaven is assaulted by storm," referring to the excitement that had been awakened since John appeared. The verse suggests that earnest endeavor is necessary in order to enter the kingdom of heaven.

E. H., Escondido, Calif., takes issue with the Christian Herald's remarks on the rise in the price of bread, and writes: "You say there is no shortage of foodstuffs, while all other papers claim there is a very short crop of grain. France and Her Fatherless

By MARIE de PERROT d'ABLANCOURT, B. ès L.

ALL Souls' Day, 1916! The church bells were tolling. In Paris, and all through France, down to the humblest village or hamlet, their mournful peal was heard; thousands, h more than ordinary piety and emotion, thronged churches and cathedrals; in our devastated rth, to the sound of the cannon, pastors and priests re speaking words of hope and encouragement to ir men. Never has an "anniversary of the dead" n so poignant as this one; for France mourned r almost one million of her sons, fallen on the d of honor.

cross the mysterious chasm which divides life m death we longed to convey many things to that at throng of which the humblest was a hero; more n all the rest, we wanted to tell them that we are ling to accept the legacy they left us, lovingly to k after their widows and children.

n February last there were already many war-hans. Verdun and the battle of the Somme ve added many, many more. Oh, how many nch children were weeping that day in churches, neteries, orphanages and desolate homes—weeping the fathers who will never come back to them! , the tens of thousands of Frenchwomen who ked at the empty places beside them, and the pang anew in those hours when remem-nce speaks and will not be silenced! A great g sob tore the soul of France on the day of her d!

hose in authority understood this; understood o that the hour would be the most propitious to ch all hearts in favor of the little ones our heroes behind. Therefore, all through the country, appeal was made by the Comité d'Attribution des nds Recueillis de la Journée des Orphelins. "The erican Relief Clearing House" in Paris, which is ng such magnificent work for France, also made an eal in its monthly leaflet for November, addressed merely to Americans residing in France, but also those at home. For this great organization, as . James R. Barbour, member of the Executive mmittee, told me, is deeply interested in the ure of our poor little children. They have been dying the question most thoroughly with the ious societies formed before or since the beginning the war, and two of its members form part of the mité d'Attribution.

he help and protection of our heroes' children is of the most momentous problems of the day, l it is essential that it should be grappled with in its gravity without delay, for on it depends the ure of the race. Two and a half million fatherless ldren! The number is so great that the mind nnot comprehend it.

Until now they have been looked after in orphan-es, in private families or in their own homes, by ritable societies, most of which are largely financed the Paris office of "The Fatherless Children of nce," or by the said "Committee of the National Day of the Orphans," founded by the Minister of the Interior in 1915, and presided over by M. Appell of the Institut de France. In this assembly are to be found representatives of the most diverse opinions and creeds, and judging from the way things are done, it bears with right the name of a "Sacred Union." This is only a temporary arrangement. When the law, of which I shall speak later, is duly passed, they will all be under the direction of a National Council.

ALL our orphanages have done wonders; the history of some reads like a romance, and proves what faith in God and trust in the goodness of human nature will achieve. But I love best "The National Association of War-orphans," the two branches of which are to be found, one at Etretat (a village in the department of Seine-Inférieure) and the other at Nice. This Association has received children from our devastated territories ever since the first days of the war, and still receives them. This without any kind of formalities, and regardless of age and number.

It was a touching and yet most comforting sight to see those dear white-robed women handling so deftly and tenderly the babies at Nice, and to watch the care taken of the small invalids in the "Sanatorium." Most of our workers were untrained and had to learn—and there were none of the stringent rules at which I sometimes have wondered in English institutions. Those gentle, sad-faced women—often war-widows themselves—who handled the little fatherless babes as if they were their own, lacked also, I agree, the decorum of well-trained nurses; but seeing them talking and singing to those little souls, loving and caressing them, I felt that the children were fortunate to be in such hands.

About one hundred registered charitable associations are looking after our orphans. Their aims are varied; but they all have the moral welfare and happiness of the child at heart. The funds to support these several institutions are forthcoming in diverse ways. Almost all are subsidized by one of the semi-official committees already mentioned; some depend entirely on voluntary gifts, while others bear witness to the practical spirit of France. . . . There is much I would like to dwell upon, especially the fine spirit which unites America to France in her great sorrow; but in the narrow space of a short article this is not possible.

There is one movement on foot which has less to do with the material than with the moral side of the orphan's life. Of this I must sketch the bare outline: The French law—we trust it will soon be changed—does not admit of the adoption of an orphan by any person under the age of fifty. But l'Association des Pupilles de la Guerre undertakes to find voluntary guardians (tuteurs or tutrices bénévoles) who, without taking the child from his home, will look after him better than his relation may be able to do. If those guardians are rich, they will cherish in every possible way those little men and women, who are so sadly in need of some one to be interested in them.

There is no doubt that French children are much "petted" in their early years—some say this accounts for our natural amiability. In any case judicious petting never yet did any one harm! Other guardians who are poor—those who struggle themselves feel most for others—will have to make sacrifices for the task they have undertaken. Their privilege, like that of the richer ones, will always be to advise and comfort the mothers, and look after their wards. If the child is ill or needs a change, these less wealthy guardians only need to apply to the fund of les Pupilles de la Guerre in order to obtain a sum which enables them to dispense comforts to their charges. Mme. Julie Henry May, the distinguished woman who has founded and presides over this scheme, makes a personal choice of those she accepts, and only people of the highest morality will be entrusted with the guardianship of a child. She aims before all at putting thoughts of all that is beautiful, pure and true into the orphans' souls. Her Orphelins de la Guerre are registered at "The Fatherless Children of France," and benefit by the "touching gifts of the Americans," as she told me herself.

Though the pressure of those terrible first days of the war was so great and unexpected, every care was taken of our orphaned children; but things were naturally done somewhat haphazard. In the sudden disaster which enshrouded us, I have often asked myself what we should have done without America, though our government made allowances and special grants, and royal gifts flowed in from private individuals.

WAR work for my countrywomen and their children keeps me at the present moment in London; but when I was recently in my Paris home, many of my friends, interested in the same things as I am, told me of "The Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the European War" which originated with the Christian Herald in the early days of the war, and is designed to continue actively until the end of the great calamity.

At a meeting of l'Union Fraternelle des Femmes, held in the interest of our war orphans, in order to ascertain what had already been done for them, in view of further developments, the beautiful and generous work this journal had undertaken in so truly Christian a spirit was amply appreciated. It has attained very considerable proportions, and is now operating through committees in eleven different countries. The one in Paris, with pastor Charles Wagner as chairman, was gratefully mentioned. As an English writer, I was asked by many to send to the Christian Herald and its readers, if ever opportunity presented itself, an expression of the gratitude which we Frenchwomen feel for our American sisters, and to say that what they have done for "these little School children of Versailles decorating the graves. "Never has an 'anniversary of the dead' been so poignant as this one" ones" only knots more firmly the ties which bind us to them.

Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, a senator and an ardent feminist, presided at this meeting. He dwelt at length on the law relating to our orphans, of which, however, only the first eleven articles have been passed in the Senate, and these still await the ratification of the Chamber of Deputies. This law admits women into the Conseil National, a permanent commission to sit in Paris, for the care of the war orphans.

All great things in life are due to the initiative of one enthusiast, and Frenchwomen owe a debt of gratitude to M. d'Estournelles de Constant, who is a great admirer of America and American institutions. "As much as our young rivals of the New World, and more even," he exclaimed in the Senate among his peers, "we need the help of woman; woman no longer placed in an inferior rank, but rehabilitated, reestablished in her rights, equal to those of men." The ministers MM. Viviani and Painlevé valiantly supported him, and homage is due to the members of the Senate that, brought face to face with the national calamity, they realized the need for the coöperation of woman.

In the Council of the Nation, to which she is now called to care for our fatherless children, she will express a new and often a saner point of view; to its debates she will bring her intuition, a closer insight, and above all her power of sympathy and the compassionate understanding of the suffering of others. This great innovation, which is only the beginning of greater things, is not the result of political clamor. Our women, at the present moment, are far too busy to trouble about the vote. Nor have they been admitted to share in the councils of men because they do man's work, though their 'prentice hand is doing master work in almost every industry and trade, providing France and Russia with shells, gathering in the harvest of a land which is essentially an agricultural country, carrying on with wonderful success

White Ribboners in Jubilant Convention

By MRS. MARTHA M. ALLEN

A VERY jubilant set of women met in the Murat Theater of Indianapolis from November 17 to 23, for the forty-third annual convention of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union. The recent victories of prohibition in Michigan, Nebraska, South Dakota, Montana and Alaska made the air electric with rejoicing. It was evident on the opening morning that women had been taking lessons from men's ways of showing enthusiasm at conventions; for after the splendid review of victories won, given in the annual address of the president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, the women of the prohibition states let loose their joy. Up and down the aisles of the theater went a great parade of the women of twenty-three prohibition states and Alaska, waving banners and singing songs of victory. Women in the "wet" states wept that they did not live in Michigan or Colorado or Kansas; then suddenly, cheered up with the thought of the splendid fighting yet to be done, they added to the glorious din by songs of "New York is going dry," "New Jersey's going dry," and so on by the various state delegations.

Another source of rejoicing was the large addition to the membership of the Women's Christian Temperance Union this year. There are now over 15,000 local unions and over 400,000 White Ribboners in the United States. The treasurer's report showed the finances of the organization to be in good condition.

Very interesting items were reported by national superintendents of departments. The superintendent of "The Bible in Public Schools" said that Indiana has a law forbidding the exclusion of the Bible from the schools of the state.

The Medical Temperance Department reported that the Dry Federation of Arizona employed a lecturer and a singer to tour the state for five months teaching the people what great physicians say of alcohol as unnecessary and harmful in the treatment of the sick. This was to strengthen the law by doing away with the "permit" system, and Arizona won what she wanted. This department also reported resolutions opposing alcohol and endorsing prohibition passed by the medical societies of the counties in which Detroit and Kansas City, Mo., are situated; also similar resolutions by other county medical societies in Michigan.

The Sunday School Department, led by that splendid woman, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine of California, reported that over 95,000 Sunday school children have this year signed a petition to Congress asking for national constitutional prohibition.

THE National Women's Christian Temperance Union has many good speakers in its ranks, but at this convention the principal addresses were given by men, and the largest interest centered in the first public appearance of William Jennings Bryan as an advocate of national prohibition. At ten o'clock on Sunday morning the theater was packed to its limit with a crowd that rose early to secure a place for hearing the great orator on a theme that now commands world-wide attention. The governor of the state sat on the platform. Mr. Bryan said he would base his arguments on three statements. These were: "1. God never made a normal brain that needed alcohol to stimulate it. 2. God never made a man strong enough to commence the use of alcohol and to be sure that he would not become a victim. 3. There is no moment in human life from birth to death when it is safe to begin the use of alcohol. . . . The best preparation for war is to have men whose brains are clear and nerves steady, with no liquor appetite to destroy their efficiency. Alcohol undermines a man's character in time of peace and his patriotism in time of war. Nations across the sea which are engaged in a death struggle have found that loyalty to alcohol is greater than loyalty to Kaiser, King or Czar." He answered the argument that saloons help business by saying that in all his travels about the country he had never seen one advertising billboard or booklet that listed its saloons among the attractions of its city. "You will find the number of factories, the number of schools and churches and banks and parks. If saloons help business why are they omitted from all advertising literature? . . . If your legislature should pass a law compelling saloon-keepers to keep their drunks in the windows so the people could see what the business does, the saloon men would fight such a law. It is the only kind of business that is ashamed of its finished product."

Mr. Bryan declared his love for the Democratic party; then with flashing eyes cried out, "I do not want to see the Democratic party buried in a drunkard's grave." He appealed to Democrats present to make the party "dry," both in Indiana and in the nation. Then he urged Republicans to a holy rivalry in driving the liquor traffic out of the country.

It was evident that the address made a powerful appeal to the audience, for men were declaring themselves strongly for prohibition at the close of the meeting. Mrs. Bryan was a delegate to the convention.

TWO notable speakers were on the program for Sunday evening: Governor Carlson of Colorado and ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana. Governor Carlson devoted all of his time to showing the improved conditions in Colorado under less than a year of prohibition. "Two years ago there were 2,653 vacant houses in Denver, now there are not 300. Business has increased over twenty-five per cent. Banks show a tremendous increase in deposits. Rents have advanced, and all the places formerly occupied by saloons are now turned into stores or offices. There are one hundred fewer criminals in the state penitentiary than at the beginning of the year. None of the predictions of the liquor men have been fulfil
The governor quoted the editor of the Denver La Bulletin as saying that 75 per cent. of the laboring per cent. better. There has not been a murde there were five or six a month formerly. The cit rid of "bums" and criminals. There are fewer a dents in the mines.

Ex-Governor Hanly directed his arguments aga the complicity of the Federal government in the liq traffic, through its inadequate oversight of inters commerce, and its license system in prohibition te tory. He said that in a debate with Hugh Fox of Brewers' Association, Fox admitted that all t
Hanly and Hobson said about the liquor traffic

Federal government to grant national prohibit because the government could not enforce it." "Th said Mr. Hanly, "is why I am in this fight. I am willing that anything in this country shall be m powerful than the sovereignty of my country."

On Monday afternoon Mr. Anthony Caminett vention of the great system of employment agen which the government is establishing throughout country, and he asked the aid of the Women's Ch tian Temperance Union in looking after women girls who obtain employment through these agenc

It was interesting to learn that the government finds positions for teachers without charge. Tea ers' agencies made large drafts on the slender s ries of those forced to seek such aid in securing sc positions.

Dr. J. N. Hurty, secretary of the Indiana S
Board of Health, addressed a packed house on "A hol and Health." He said alcohol as a medicine is worth a snap of one's finger; that women using a hol for a weak heart are only adding to the weakn
He said gluttony leads to intemperance, and glutt is a prevailing sin.

A good many business men and ministers of Indi were introduced to the convention. With scarc an exception they all declared themselves strongly favor of woman suffrage as well as prohibition.

A banner belonging to the bartenders' union of Dalles, Oregon, was sent to the convention by mayor of The Dalles as a trophy won. The barte ers presented it to the mayor, as their union went of existence with his strict enforcement of the p hibitory law.

Miss Anna A. Gordon, president, and all the ot officers were reelected. Mrs. William Jennings Br

Peace and Arbitration.

Good Will Toward Men

By
FLORENCE TINSLEY COX

MISS CAMILLA WICK threaded her needle carefully, leaning nearer to the lamp on the table before her so as to get a better light. She had far-sighted old eyes and a avy brow and a mouth that showed considerable termination. The table was covered with the red oth which she always put on after the supper dishes ere cleared away and she and her brother Benedict d settled down for a long evening together. There ere just the two of them left out of a family of nine icks, and the table had shrunk and shrunk, losing a af after each Wick death, until now it appeared alost a stand in comparison with its former estate. ld Miss Camilla had cut and recut that red cloth, st in halves, and finally in eights, so that there ight be no waste of the precious material, for her ul abhorred waste. She had a great many trunks d cupboards upstairs filled with the clothes of her efunct family, and every May she brought down eat armfuls to be washed and aired before being nsigned to cedar and camphor for yet another year. umor stated that she had even r grandmother's baby caps laid vay in lavender, and old Mrs. eoffrey, who being bedridden as obliged to watch her neighbors through a spy-glass if she xpected to know any news at all, d counted inconceivable numbers of petticoats hung upon lines the Wicks' back premises. And ere was china on well-ordered elves, and patchwork quilts, d homespun sheets, and even e trousseau that the youngest ick girl, Louisa Emily, had yfully made during the summer efore she was drowned in the ke. For some unknown reason liss Camilla's thoughts were usy with poor Louisa Emily as e threaded her needle that inter evening—Louisa Emily, ho had gone out a laughing girl ith a merry skating party, to be rought home cold and lifeless ss than an hour afterward.

"It's just the kind of weather was when Louisa Emily died," he said. "Bright and crisp. Regular Christmas weather."

Her brother Benedict on the ther side of the table looked rom her to the red-hot Franklin tove.

"Purty cold," he said, drowsily. Purty cold. Snowing again."

"Ain't you going to do nothin'?" Miss Camilla demanded sharply. Ain't you going to read a bit? low far did we git in the encyclopedia?"

"I dunno," Benedict replied. 'Seems to me we'd about reached Magnetism."

"Wal, for the land sakes, start n on Magnetism then. We can't vaste time this way!"

She rose up alertly and brought him a ponderous volume. Then she found his spectacles and lapped them down before him. But even as she did so, her brother ifted his hand.

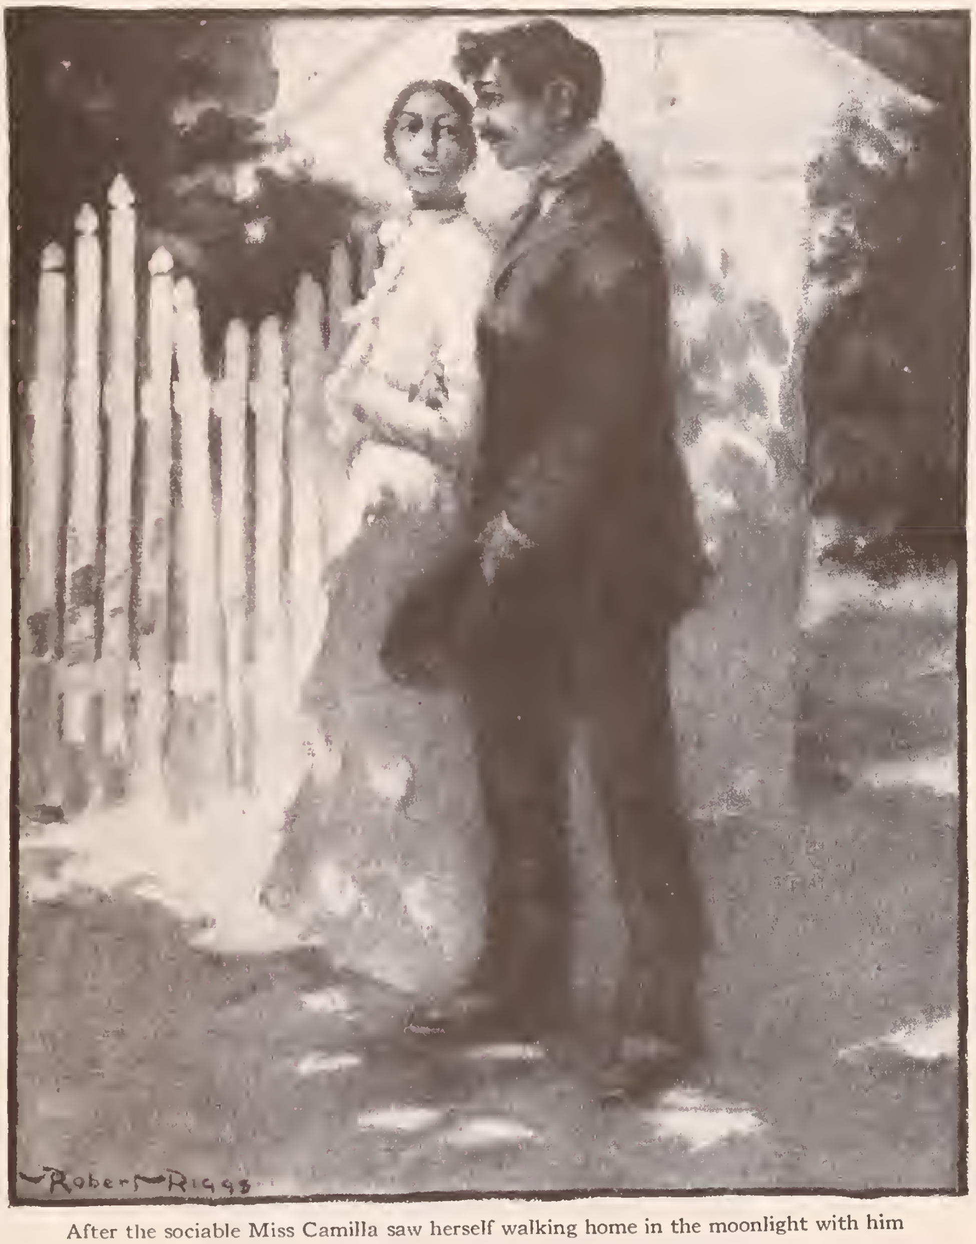
"Hark! Wasn't somebody knocking?" he asked.

The knock came again, a little ouder this time.

"It's the side door," Miss Camilla commented briefly. "Put your comforter around your throat before you open up. Don't take no chances. Now I wonder who under the canopy is out sech a night?"

There was a rush of frosty air as the side door was cautiously opened, and then Benedict's voice could be heard ushering some one along the hall. The voices came nearer.

"Who do you suppose it is, Camilla?" Benedict asked.



After the sociable Miss Camilla saw herself walking home in the moonlight with him

THE woman who followed him into the bright room looked uncertain of her welcome. Her black coat was thickly sprinkled with snow, and her face gazed out wanly from an old-fashioned black bonnet. She was forty, perhaps—a forty that had met with much trouble and sorrow. There was a spent appearance about her as though she had labored early and late and while she worked cried a little in secret.

"It's me, Camilla," she said quietly.

Miss Camilla had risen from her chair. She had been sewing as Benedict read—sewing on a pink cretonne bag which lay on the table, bright and pretty, with a suggestion of Christmas in its rosy folds. The room was warm and cheerful, and there was a look of absolute well-being about the rather handsome elderly woman who stood by the table with a trifle of hauteur in the pose of her head.

"I never expected to see you again, Statira Fisher," Miss Wick said.

"I don't suppose you did," the other rejoined. She paused a moment. "When Alfred died——" she began.

"What!" Miss Camilla exclaimed. She put one hand on the table to steady herself.

The other woman nodded.

"He died three months ago. I meant to send you word; but I was worried and unhappy. He was twenty years older than me; but I never expected he'd die first."

Miss Camilla steadied herself again.

"Was it a long illness? Did he have good care?"

"All I could do I did. But there wasn't much money, and I had the children to look after. He wasn't neglected; but his death was a relief."

She stopped a moment.

"He drank," she said, simply.

Before the older woman's eyes was passing a succession of pictures. She saw herself twenty years younger, thirty-five again, and in love for the first time in her life. She had been the oldest of her family, the patient, self-sacrificing, eldest sister, and unexpectedly fate had offered her tardy compensation. For a whole year she had been happy. She could remember yet the radiance of those twelve short months. In her mind they formed themselves into pictures. There was the first time that she met Alfred Fisher at a village sociable. Afterward Alfred had beaued her home. Miss Camilla saw herself walking along the street in the moonlight, she who had never had a beau, walking along beside him with a queer little flutter at her heart. The honeysuckle was in bloom over the front porch. She gave him a spray when he said good-night. And all the next day she had laughed at herself, and fretted, too, with a secret feeling that all the village must know what a fool she had been. A woman of thirty-five to accept attentions from a stranger! He came again.

There was the time he hulled strawberries for her, and the time he told her about his active business life which had kept him from marrying. He was forty himself. There was the time they had a quarrel. And the time they made it up. And the time out in a boat on the lake in the twilight when he asked her to marry him. The Wick family was large in those days, and she had hesitated, wondering if she could be spared, but somehow it ended in her saying yes. A younger woman would have been harder to win, more coy and less honest and outspoken; but it seemed so wonderful, so magical, to Miss Camilla that anyone should love her, should want to have her with him all his life, that she loved him back from sheer gratitude. What a simpleton she had been to think that she could hold a man's love, to think that men looked below the surface of a woman's face and accounted wrinkles but accidents of time! Well, well!

The awakening was bitter. Little Statira James came home from boarding school and sang in the choir in the village church. She brought back a trunkful of fresh white dresses trimmed with babyish blue bows. She had a blue hat that tied under her chin with ribbons. Miss Camilla could remember the afternoon Alfred told her he had been invited to sing in the choir. She was not jealous, only proud that such an honor should have been paid him. It was a little hard later to watch him and Statira singing from the same book; but Miss Camilla was loyal to her love even in thought. When the news first came to her that he spent three evenings out of the week at Statira's house, she could not believe it; but the story was repeated from so many sources that at last she sent for him. She confronted him in the very room where she was standing now.

"You are making a fool of one of us," she said, after a breathless repetition of the gossip. "And it shan't be me. This ends everything."

She was hard and wrathful, cut to the heart by his disloyalty. He had stammered something about enjoying Statira's music. He had thought she would understand, that she knew him too well for suspicion. There was one phrase of his that lingered in her ears for months.

"With you I am at my best," he said.

Still angry and sore, she turned away and would not listen.

Then the inevitable happened. He married Statira James, as everyone prophesied he would, while Camilla Wick carried her broken heart so bravely that no one even suspected that it was broken or different from the other hearts about her. Alfred and his bride left town, and for twenty years she had rarely heard his name. And now his widow stood before her.

"WON'T you sit down?" Miss Camilla asked, harshly. She felt that in her big chair she could bear it better and not have that strange, tottery feeling that compelled her to cling to the table.

"There's one thing I'd like to say," the other woman continued, subsiding into a chair. "About his drinking now. I mentioned that, you know. Fred was a weak man. He didn't know what was best for himself. He didn't drink to any great extent. Just moderately. But it made a deal of trouble. He lost situation after situation. He never would have had that last attack of pneumonia but for being lost in a snowstorm. He couldn't find his way home."

"Why didn't you stop him drinking?" Miss Wick demanded.

"Stop him! Why, Camilla!"

"Yes, stop him!" Miss Wick continued, fiercely. "Do you s'pose I'd see a man going to lifelong trouble and degradation and not put out a helping hand? I'd ha' stopped him"—a sudden sob—"for I loved him."

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

Organizing for Peace. In conferences in New York City Friday and Saturday, November 24 and 25, a branch of the American Neutral Conference Committee was organized, the purpose being to arouse the American public to a sense of what it may contribute toward stopping the world war. At the meeting on Friday, messages were received from Viscount Grey, Ambassador Bernstorff for the German Chancellor, Lord Bryce and Prime Minister Briand. Lord Grey and Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg both endorsed the League to Enforce Peace as worthy of their support after the war. The idea of the present organization is that the league may now afford a proper instrument for the early bringing of peace.

Uncle Sam's Pocketbook. The report of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30 shows that the government then held gold to the amount of $1,803,493,932.83, an increase during the year of more than $400,000,000. Money in circulation had increased by a similar amount to $4,024,097,762, or $39.28 per capita. The treasury surplus for the year on ordinary transactions was $55,171,553.59.

Charles E. Hughes, Barrister. Formal announcement was made on November 27 that ex-Justice Charles E. Hughes would resume the practice of law on January 1 as a member of his old firm, which after that date will be Hughes, Rounds, Schurman & Dwight, Charles E. Hughes, Jr., also becoming a member of the firm.

World's Wheat Crop. The International Institute of Agriculture at Rome estimates the combined wheat crops of fourteen principal countries at 2,222,914 bushels, 73.4 per cent. of last year's production. Rye is estimated at 94.4 per cent. of last year's crop, barley at 90 per cent., oats at 83.2 per cent., and corn at 85.7 per cent., which, however, is 96.7 per cent. of the average crop.

The Outgo of the Income The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year of 1916 shows that individual income tax returns aggregated $67,943,594.63, the corporation tax yielding $56,993,657.98, total $124,937,252.61. It was $80,201,758.86 last year. There were 336,652 persons who paid the tax, of whom 120,402 had incomes between five and ten thousand dollars. Of the persons taxed 266,153 were married, 47,583 were single men, and 22,916 were single women, and 120 persons paid on incomes in excess of a million dollars, double the number of the previous year. The total of the incomes taxed was $8,703,068,389. The whole internal revenue collection reached $512,723,287.77, a gain of about $97,000,000.

No Happy Medium. The Lambert & Holt liner Vestris, which sailed from New York for Buenos Aires on November 25, carried two unusual passengers. Miss Alice Cherry, who weighs but 530 pounds, went aboard only after the gangplank had been strengthened. Her stateroom had been prepared by the removal of the upper berth, and lest Miss Cherry should prove too great a stabilizer, the passenger list included Hayti Hassid, who is thirty inches high and weighs one pound to the inch. Mr. Hassid is reported to have asked the steward to make his bed in the little hammock, provided for collars and neckties, in the bunk.

Completing the Circle. Captain Roald Amundsen, who discovered that the South Pole was just where the geographers said it was, is planning to verify Mr. Peary's report of the position of the northern axis. He plans to leave Norway in July, 1918, in a power schooner, and to enter the drift ice north of Siberia, drifting across the Polar Cap and coming out somewhere between Spitzbergen and Greenland. An aeroplane will be carried and the plan is to make a flight for the pole from the nearest point to which the boat drifts, which it is estimated will mean a flight of less than 200 miles. The object of the expedition is to study the air and ocean currents in the neighborhood of the pole.

The Panama Express. According to a tabulation of the time of transit of the ships using the Panama Canal in October, the average time of passage of the 158 vessels was 11 hours and 40 minutes, the quickest passage being seven hours and seventeen minutes, and the longest one day eight hours and ten minutes. In the twenty months that the canal has been in operation since its first opening, the aggregate cargo carried through the canal has been about 10,585,000 tons. In the month of August, 1916, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal around St. Mary's Falls, Michigan, carried 14,031,262 tons of cargo. The Sault Canal is said to handle over twice as much traffic as the Suez Canal.

Our Friends the Birds. According to the annual report of the National Association of Audubon Societies, the work of organizing junior Audubon Societies has resulted in the forming of 9,901 groups, with a membership of 205,196. These children are given regular instruction in bird lore, being taught the living, feeding and nesting habits of the feathered citizens of the woods. They learn to recognize the birds and become intelligent protectors and firm allies of the songsters in the battle against their many enemies; a battle that has been much too unequal.

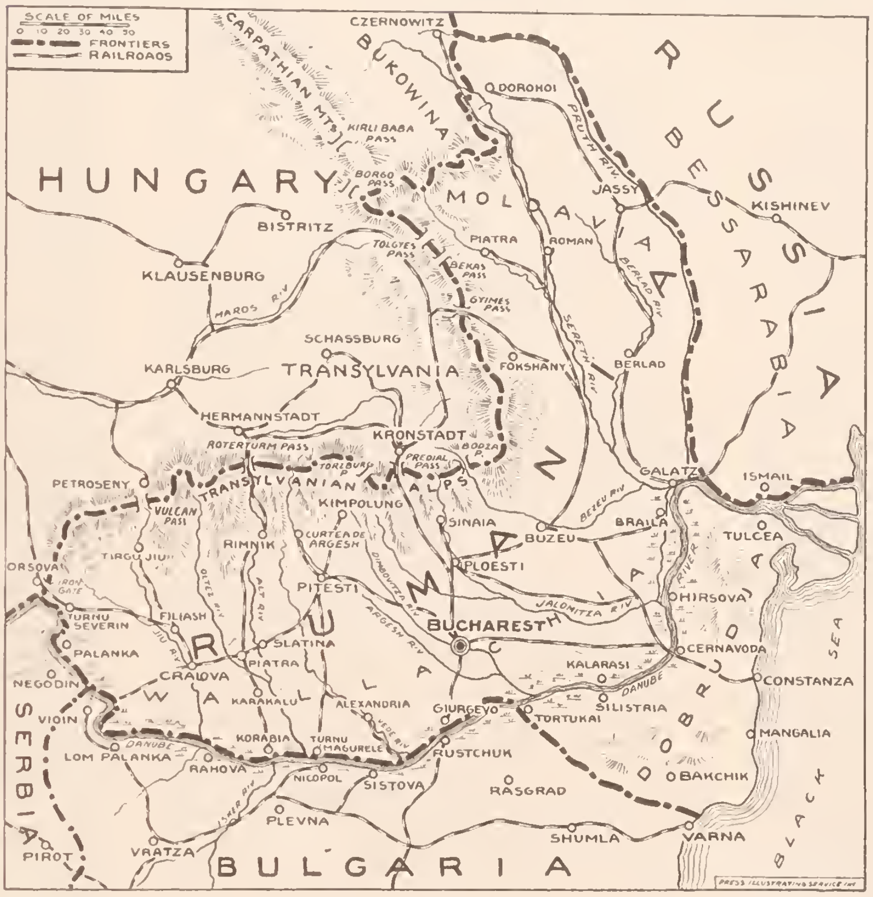
Pellagra Said to Be Infectious. The report on November 18 of the Thompson McFadden Commission, established in 1912 for the study of pellagra, took issue with the United States Public Health Service by declaring that this disease, according to its findings, is infectious. The commission found that the spread of the disease was halted by proper sanitary arrangements in several plague spots in the South. According to the report of the commission, the best treatment consists of rest, careful nursing and proper diet, a treatment similar to that given tuberculosis patients.



The Eastern Battleground

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE most important military activities of the week November 23–29 have been in Rumania, and the net result of these is well summarized in the announcement made the morning of the 29th to the effect that the Rumanian government had abandoned the capital, Bucharest, and with the diplomatic corps had removed to Jassy, 200 miles to the north, and only a few miles from the Russian frontier.

The successive advances by the Teutons which led to this action of the Rumanian government were as follows: On Friday, November 23, with the capture of Orsova and of Turnu Severin, ten miles or so southeast of Orsova, all real power of resistance by the Rumanians in that portion of Rumania west of a north and south line drawn through Craiova ended. What is to become of the Rumanian army defending these towns is not yet certain, but presumably it will be captured. This presumption does not seem a particularly violent one, since the only line on which it could by any possibility retreat across country to the southeast would eventually land it in the arms of the Teutons operating along the line of the railway running south from Craiova to the Danube. In fact, we are informed that a force is moving from the east against it.

The closing up of Rumania west of the line indicated above did two things, both of which are decidedly advantageous to the Teutons. First, it removed for a long time any possibility of a Russo-Rumanian force battering its way westward so as to interfere with the railroad south from Belgrade, which constitutes the highway whereby the Central Powers communicate freely with Bulgaria, Turkey and Asia Minor. Second, it shortened the Teutonic battle line on the Rumanian front by at least 75 miles.

In addition to these very important things, the capture of Craiova and the country to the west of it not only put the best of the Rumanian wheat lands in the power of the Teuton, but also delivered to him a large portion of this autumn's crop, which the Allies purchased and stored in Craiova in order to prevent its purchase by the Germans.

Saturday and Sunday the Teutons advanced steadily and the troops of von Mackensen, who succeeded in crossing the Danube a couple of days before, reached the outskirts of the town of Alexandria, some forty-seven miles southwest of the Rumanian capital, on the Vede River. In the west, in the lower Alt valley, the German cavalry crossed the river of the same name, and after defeating the Rumanian cavalry opposed to it harassed the rear guards of the main Rumanian army, retreating in the direction of the capital, and also took contact with von Mackensen's army to the south.

The net result of the events of the two days was to place all of Rumania to the west of the Alt, in German hands.

The Rumanian situation did not at all improve on Monday; in fact, it grew worse, as the Teutons continued to make progress toward the east and Bucharest. The town of Alexandria was attacked from the south and west and passed, after a brief struggle, into Teutonic hands. Between Orsova and Rustchuk the Danube was cleaned up and most of the vessels thereon changed masters, with the result that the invaders are now practically masters of the river between the points mentioned.

Farther east, the whole left or eastern bank of the Alt River, from the Transylvania border to the Danube, passed into the hands of the Teutons. North of Piatra they also captured the village of Topolosh, half-way between the Alt River and the western of the two lines of railway which runs north from Pitesci.

On Tuesday, in the north, Curtea de Arges, at the head of the western terminal of the two lines of railway which, running from the north, join the line running from Orsova to Bucharest, passed into the hands of the Teutons. This town is situated a scant twenty miles southwest of Campulung, where hard fighting has been going on for the past few weeks, and a slightly shorter distance west of the line of the railroad running south from Campulung to Pitesci.

By its capture the Rumanian forces around Campulung will in all probability be forced to retreat south before this Campulung-Pitesci line is reached by the victorious Teutons moving from the west, or else risk the certainty of being enveloped on three sides, with only one line of retreat left, to the east through a difficult country in the direction of Puciosa or Campina.

In the center, the Teutonic forces moving along the Orsova-Bucharest railway have crossed the Alt River on their entire front, and attained the western bank of the Vede River, running roughly parallel to the Alt, and on an average twelve miles to the east thereof. In the south the town of Giurgiu on the Danube was captured by the Teutons. This town is the southern terminus of a railroad leading northeast to Bucharest, and about thirty-seven miles therefrom. North, west and south the semicircle enveloping the Rumanian capital is gradually drawing nearer, and on Wednesday afternoon, November 29, its capture seemed as certain as any unhappened event can be, which belief was strengthened by the action of the Rumanian government in removing the capital.

RUSSIA on November 30 partly answered the question as to what the Entente was going to do to help Rumania by an attack in force delivered from Bukowina to southeast of Kronstadt in Transylvania, by sending Russian troops to reinforce the defenders of Bucharest, and by attacking on the whole front in Dobrudja. On December 3, the net result of this effort seemed to be that the Russians at great cost had made a slight advance in the neighborhood of Kirlibaba, where any considerable advance would mean a serious invasion of Hungary and would threaten the communications and endanger the armies of Marshal von Falkenhayn, and had gained possession of a series of heights further south. Violent fighting was proceeding along the whole line. In Dobrudja some slight gains had been made near Cernavoda. South of Bucharest, Russian troops had forced von Mackensen back slightly, taking two villages and some prisoners and equipment. West and northwest of Bucharest, the Germans had crossed the Argechu valley in two places, outflanking an important Rumanian force which had attempted a considerable offensive movement. The situation around Bucharest was considerably mixed on this date. It was announced that the fortress had been dismantled, and the civilian population was in flight. The Rumanian army was still fighting gamely in spots, and Russian reinforcements were arriving but in what strength and with what artillery support was not yet clear.

The political crisis in Russia has resulted in the retirement of Premier Stürmer and the naming of Mr. Trepoff to succeed him. At the moment this change is not understandable, and further details must be awaited before its full purport can be grasped. Apparently it is a victory for the Liberal element in Russia, but this statement is at present made with all reserve. A political crisis also seemed imminent in Great Britain on December 3. Cabinet reorganization appeared inevitable with the possibility that Lloyd George might succeed Premier Asquith as head of the government.

The French have established a new ministry, that of provisions. This ministry will henceforth have full and completely independent charge of the provisioning of the army as well as of civilians. For the second time since the war began the French Chamber of Deputies met this week in secret session.

French newspapers were urging the complete nationalization of civil life along lines similar to those already followed by Germany. A typical article began thus, "Time passes. We talk; Germany acts."

A German destroyer flotilla made a raid on the English east coast during the week. Comparatively small results,

The Witness of the Spirit

*A SERMON BY REV. D. H. STEFFENS

TEXT—Rom. 8:16. "The Spirit itself beareth witness to our spirit, that we are the children of God."

THE commentator Olshausen remarks that this is one of the most decisive passages in Scripture against the pantheistic view of the identity of the Spirit of God and the spirit of man. However the one may by renovating power be rendered like the other, there still is a specific difference. True as it is that we are temples of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, we do not thereby lose our identity. We do not become God, but only like God. According to II Cor. 7 : 1 the spirit of man may sin. The Spirit of God cannot, but can only be "grieved" (Eph. 4 : 30) or "quenched" (I Thess. 5 : 19). There is, therefore, a very essential difference between the two, and if we would understand what is meant by "the witness of the Spirit," it is of supreme importance that we clearly grasp and firmly hold this distinction.

Our text leaves us in no doubt that there is such a thing as a testimony of the Spirit, for it plainly and emphatically tells us that "the Spirit itself beareth witness to our spirit." But if we ask just what is meant by this wonderful phrase, it is not easy to get a clear and intelligible reply. It is perhaps most commonly assumed that this heavenly testimony is a great and peculiar privilege, experienced only by certain Christians who have spent hours and days in wrestling with God, until the darkness which enveloped their souls was suddenly pierced by a ray of heavenly light, when their hardened hearts melted into a fervor of ecstatic joy. The "witness of the Spirit" is thus held to be a special token or assurance of the reality of conversion, or being in a state of grace. But there is no hint in our text that this witness of the Spirit is the privilege of a certain favored few. It is rather spoken of as the common possession of all of God's children who are in Christ Jesus; for Paul, speaking of himself and his fellow believers, broadly says: "The Spirit beareth witness to our spirit, that we are the children of God." It is of supreme importance that we hold to this fact. To overlook it and confine the application of this passage to those Christians who claim to have witnessed certain signs and wonders in connection with their conversion, is to invite doubt and despair on the part of those whose prayers have not enabled them to witness such tangible tokens of God's favor; or, on the other hand, to invite carnal security and spiritual pride on the part of those who persuade themselves that they have attained to spiritual heights untrodden by the feet of other less favored believers.

NEITHER does Paul say that God's Spirit bears witness to our spirit immediately, or apart from the appointed means of grace. Quite the reverse. He tells us that "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." He therefore asks the Galatians: "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith?" The "hearing of faith" is the hearing of the Word of God, and that is Paul's reason for calling the Gospel ministry "the ministration of the Spirit." Accordingly, the witness of the Spirit cannot be an indefinite and indescribable something beside and apart from the Word, a mysterious and subtle influence manifesting itself in overwrought emotions and unrestrained excitement, in a sudden revulsion of feeling, when the pendulum swings from extreme fear to extreme joy. On the other hand, its result is something more and higher than mere subjective inferences and conclusions; mere intellectual assent and acceptance of certain truths. It is a divinely wrought conviction of sin and of grace, a deep, heartfelt comfort such as only the Comforter can give, an apprehending of the consolation offered and bestowed by the Gospel, a "tasting of the heavenly gift and the good word of God," a heavenly assurance and certainty of full pardon and sonship; a firm hope which maketh not ashamed. As Martin Luther says: "You can certainly feel and know when you, in your anxiety and despair, have found comfort in the Gospel and have thereby overcome such agony of soul, so that your heart firmly believes that you have a gracious God." It manifests itself by the Spirit's making us to hate sin and strive after holiness; by his stirring us up to prayer; by his prompting us to works of love and mercy; by his moving us to hear testimony for Christ before the world; by his making us to be more and more conformed to the image of him who is our Redeemer, looking forward to the great day when we shall be eternally satisfied by awaking in his likeness.

But such is the weakness of our flesh that we do not at all times and in all places experience this blessed testimony. "We cannot," as Spurgeon puts it, "always be with our Lord upon the Mount of Transfiguration; we must come down and see the helpless disciples with the lunatic child." We cannot always feel and experience the witness of the Spirit. The same Paul who exultingly asks: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" also moans: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

NOW, the very nature of any testimony demands that it be brought forward to attest a truth and thus remove doubt. Having done this, it, for the time being, has fulfilled its purpose. It may therefore be allowed to rest until a new question or renewed doubt calls for renewed attestation or witness-bearing. It is therefore not strange that a Christian does not always and with the same full measure experience the witness of the Spirit. Having persuaded and convinced us of our sonship, the Holy Spirit lets us rest in that blessed fact and act upon it, until renewed testimony again becomes necessary.

If he were to do otherwise, this very witness of the Spirit might lead us into reliance upon powers which we imagine to be all our own. Thinking we stand, we might forget to take heed lest we fall. The constant tasting of this blessed testimony might fill us with haughty, pharisaic pride. It might tend to make us to think lightly of sin, and, by an inevitable consequence, also to think lightly of grace. Instead of working out our salvation with fear and trembling; instead of striving to make our calling and election sure; instead of being watchful, sober, diligent, looking for the coming of our Lord, we would think only of being "carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease." Such is the strength of sin in us, that no man can truthfully claim to experience the witness of the Spirit without interruption. John explicitly tells us that there are times when a Christian is condemned by his own heart. There were days in the life of Paul when he felt his thorn in the flesh, rather than the joy of believing. And there are days in the life of every child of God when he is urged to say with David: "I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long." But, in God's gracious providence, sunshine always follows rain even as day follows night. And so the Holy Spirit again and again makes us to experience the heavenly comfort of blessed testimony, attesting to us that we are, a all, the children of God. Speaking unto our s his word of truth he pours the healing oil and win his gracious promises into our wounded hearts, lifts us up to taste again that heavenly joy which be fully ours only in the life to come. Overcoming doubts, he makes our poor spirit to rejoice with and holy joy.

These are indeed a Christian's red-letter d Would to God we were worthy and strong enoug have more of them! But even without them, t ought never be a day so dark in the life of a Chris as to make it impossible for him to see his grac Lord with eyes of faith through every cloud of tr lation. Even though he, for the moment, lack feeling or perception of the Spirit's testimony witness, a man may yet be a Christian. More t that, he may know himself to be a child of God, e though he be in deepest trial and affliction.

DO you ask, "How can these things be?" Pau this same chapter, gives us the answer. says: "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to flesh to live after the flesh. For if ye live after flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Christian is by no means so completely freed from flesh as to feel no sinful desires and to experience temptations to sin. He is delivered from its bond He is no more a debtor to the flesh, to live after flesh. Moved by the Spirit of God, he mortifies deeds of the body. He hates and fights sin. H oppressed by it. He desires to be delivered from His spirit cries out against it. He does all "through the Spirit." And it is this which dis guishes him from the men who live, not after Spirit, but after the flesh, loving it and willingly s ing it for its own sake.

Here, then, is the mark whereby I may k whether or not I am a Christian. Just as long find in me the Spirit warring against the flesh, jus long as I can truthfully say, "I delight in the la God after the inward man," just so long may I certain that I am being moved by the Spirit, e though "I see another law in my members war against the law of my mind." We may not always upon the Mount of Transfiguration, despite pleadings for permission to build tabernacles as pl of permanent abode. We may indeed, by the wit of the Spirit, have our moments of exaltation, w lifted out of ourselves, we are privileged to experie a foretaste of the joys of our true state as being children of God. But these days are apt to be f Like the disciples of old, most of our time will be sp among the halt and the blind, the sick and posses on the dull plain of everyday life. Only at rare in vals may we escape feeling the world's woe, and impotence to help.

But we need not despair, for Jesus is there. promise stands: "Lo, I am with you alway, e unto the end of the world." And so we can a "Who shall separate us from the love of Chri shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or fami or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" Here is the bles reply: "Nay, in all these things we are more t conquerors through him that loved us. For I persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor ang nor principalities, nor powers, nor things prese nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor a other creature, shall be able to separate us from love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

FOR ME, BUT ONE

By CLAIRE ESTABROOK BOYLE

COME a thousand soldiers,
Marching to the war;
Bands are gayly playing,
Helmets shine afar.
Marches not a braver
Soldier than my son;
Come a thousand soldiers—
For me, but one.

Now a thousand soldiers
In the trenches lie,
Worn with weary fighting
Of the months gone by.
In the winter's snowing,
In the summer's sun,
Lie a thousand soldiers—
For me, but one.

Lost, a thousand soldiers,
So the message comes;
Dirges sadly play it;
Muffled now the drums.
Gained, a line of trenches,
Victory is won;
Lost, a thousand soldiers—
For me, but one.

Wells Without Water

SUNDAY, December 17. II Peter 2 : 17. "These are wells without water." There is something deeply impressive and exhilarating in the sight of an old well, whose waters are as sweet as bountiful as ever. Pilgrims of succeeding erations make their way to these wells over sty plains, and the waters never fail. Jacob's well still its treasure. The women of Nazareth will oday to the Virgin's well. This constancy is very ious and beautiful. On the other hand, can any- ig create more disappointment and chagrin than a l without water, a well which is a mere pretense ı well, a well which has everything but the one ıg, and therefore has nothing? Pilgrims draw r in hope, and they go away as those who have n mocked.

And such waterless wells are known in the deeper eriences of life. For instance, what is it but a l without water when we find credal utterances hout a vital faith? We most unhappily forget t it is our holy privilege to quench the thirst of the d, as well as to receive refreshment at his hands. wants to come in and sup with us. And it is our h which offers him the water which he seeks. l how he exulted when he found it: "I have not nd so great faith, no, not in Israel." That was a l pouring forth its waters on the soil of disad- ntage, soil which had not been the gathering- und of rich traditions. But we often offer the d a repetition of a creed in which there is no h, and we thereby mock his craving, and he is not isfied.

And here is another well without water, an organ- l fellowship without a vital love. For what should human communion be but the dwelling-place of a h and abiding love? The essential life of all vital owship is a noble charity; and if men are organ- l into brotherhoods, and there is no brotherliness them, what is that but a mere pretense? And if se fellowships chance to be churches of the living d, what are they but the hollow mockeries of the y ministries of the Lord? Men and women come them, expecting holy love, and they find a cold and gealing organization. They come to quench ir thirst, and they find wells without water, large tenses, but devoid of heaven's grace. These owships may have everything except the one thing which they were ordained, and therefore they have ctically nothing. And pilgrims draw near to such rches, and they go away again.

And here is one other of these waterless wells— ral teachings in which there is no vital hope. en we go into realms of spiritual need, whether be where iniquity is like a cart-rope, or where it is ined like cords of vanity; where lust abounds or pride of life, and take with us only fine ethical ttoes, splendid moral ideals, and take nothing e, we shall most surely depress the pilgrims into eper heaviness and sink them to despair. There no quickening hope. There is no life which is ht, and no light which is life. It is Christ who is he hope of glory." Leave him out, and hope is ad. We have Sinai without Calvary; we have a ll without water. J. H. J.

Keep Your Lattice Open Heavenward

MONDAY, December 18. Dan. 6 : 10–22. "His windows were open toward Jerusalem." That ndow opened toward Jerusalem is extremely sug- stive and moving. It shows where Daniel's heart s. Acts which are in themselves insignificant are e surest revelations of character. Your Jerusalem y seem unattainable, but struggle toward it, and ery prayer you offer for the realization of your eal brings it nearer, even though you may not live see it.

When Daniel lay dying, we may imagine that he ld his servants so to place the bed that he might ok westward, in the direction of his prayer; and obably by that time Jerusalem was beginning to ise from the dust and clothe herself in her beautiful rments.

Babylon was full of fascination. The lure of sensual light was strong. Multitudes of young lives had ne down before it. But the things that attracted hers had no fascination for Daniel, because his heart as always open, not only to Jerusalem, but to all at Jerusalem stood for—the high ethic of the ebrew people. This vision made all else distasteful.

We live in the Babylons of modern civilization, and ust pray, as Daniel did, in the morning when we go forth, at noon when the tide of engagements is high, and at night, when we turn from the dust and turmoil toward the City beyond the stars.

Keep the lattice open to God. Have no barrier between you and heaven. Babylon made a law that none should pray. Heaven made a law that men should always pray and not faint. There was no doubt which law should prevail. The man that stands with God overcomes the world. F. B. M.

The Human Conception of Deity

TUESDAY, December 19. Isa. 46 : 5. "To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal, and compare me, that we may be like?" The difficulty of defining what God really is, has always been felt by all religions. In a visit to Egypt we were impressed by the way the Mohammedans held to the commandment, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." They go so far as to exclude pictures or any representations of deity whatsoever.

The Old Testament writers at one time speak of Jehovah as intimately near, and in the same chapter they will see another side of his deity that causes the writer to feel an overwhelming awe in the presence of God, as he cries, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" We find different names for God throughout the Bible, that seem to represent different phases of his infinite being, revealed at different times and to different individuals.

This universality and divine uniqueness has made God the object of worship through the ages, even when nations change, as the Jewish nation for example has changed, being again and again transplanted in new soil. Amid all the changes of their national life, the Hebrew religion remains unchanged.

It is this infinite adaptability of God that has impressed me more perhaps than anything else in my journeys around the world. In every nation, however diverse the customs, God comes to men and women in a form to meet the soul's deepest longing. Is it not a comforting thought to realize that we have a Father who is incomparable in his ability to adjust his care and direction to every one of us, no matter how particular and individual our needs?

He Pardons Us and Lifts Us Up

WEDNESDAY, December 20. Jonah 2 : 1–10. "Jonah prayed unto the Lord his God." Jonah had failed. Entrusted with a responsible mission, he had yielded to cowardice. We are all tempted at various times to shrink back before overwhelming difficulties, because we measure ourselves against them in our own strength, and fail to take God into account. Then, for our fault and delinquency, we have to confess that we are cast out from before God's eyes. Not that we ever cease to be objects of his love, but that we are no longer sensible of his favor. There is a veil between us and the face of our heavenly Father. We go down into the depths, and all his waves and billows go over us.

In such a plight it is good to be able to say with this runaway prophet: "I will look again toward thy holy temple." We remember how we were wont to look, and how we never looked in vain. We refuse to be daunted by the grievous disabilities and discouragements that arise from our failures. We dare to believe that his love is absolutely unchanged and unchangeable.

When your soul faints within you, remember the Lord. It is a beautiful daring of faith when, from the depth of the ocean of our despair, we can look again to where the Shekinah shines,—the glory of God in the face of our Saviour. He has prayed for us that our faith may not fail, and he confidently anticipates the moment when we shall be turned again.

The grace of God brings up our life from the pit of corruption into which we had fallen, and in answer to our prayer to be remembered he declares that he has graven us on the palm of his hand, and that though mothers may forget their children, he will not forget us. It is under such circumstances that we return to the temple to praise him and pay our vows.

The Thirst of the Soul

THURSDAY, December 21 Ps. 42 : 2. "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." The psalmist implies in this beautiful figure that the thirst of the soul for God is as natural, as truly embedded in our nature, as is the thirst of the deer for the water brooks in the mountains.

Even the men most skeptical of orthodox theology have admitted this positive fact of human nature. Auguste Comte concludes his life of philosophy and science by instituting a religion of humanity. Even Herbert Spencer, the modern spokesman of evolution, contends in the opening chapters of his "First Principles" that the ultimate object of religion is the ultimate object of science.

Again, the psalmist cries that the sparrow hath found an house and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young; leading us to this thought: If every appetite and longing of human nature has found its satisfaction, shall the thirst for God, which is universal in man and links him to eternity, be the only thing to go unsatisfied—the only instinct of human nature for which no food is provided?

No, says the Scriptural seer. He who looks out for the beasts of the field has provided a refuge and a rest for the people of God. They shall "put their trust under the shadow of his wings," they shall be made to drink of the river of the pleasures of God.

What are we doing, in these busy twentieth century days, to slake the thirst of our immortal souls? A friend said recently, "I am teaching a Bible class in order to keep my soul alive." Happy is the man or woman who places himself or herself under some religious or spiritual obligation. C. S. C.

Watching and Waiting to Hear God's Will

FRIDAY, December 22. Hab. 2 : 1–4; 3 : 1–6. "I will stand upon my watch." It was an era of world convulsion, and in the clash of empires met in battle-shock, it seemed as though the frail Hebrew nationality that lay between Egypt and Babylon would be obliterated from the face of the earth. Surely, neither the wit of the statesman nor the prowess of arms would avail to save them from the fate which was befalling all the smaller independent nations. Under these circumstances the prophet, like many others of his time, turned to God, and, quoting the wonders of the past, entreated him to do again as in the passage of the Red Sea and in other deeds of the great days of old. "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years; in wrath remember mercy."

But the man of God must do more than this; he must get into his watch-tower, and wait to see what answer will be granted to his prayer, and what the Spirit of God will say to him. He may have to wait long. The vision may be yet for an appointed time, but it will speak. Though it tarry, it is worth waiting for; and when it comes to reassure the soul, it is the certain guarantee of a divine deliverance being on its way.

When you stand in a belfry, you are stunned with the sound of bells immediately above you; but at a distance you discover that they were ringing in mellow beauty. In the pressure of the hour, you cannot discern God's purpose; but wait; when an interval of time and space has passed, you will detect the music of God's purpose. F. B. M.

The Bethlehem Manger

SATURDAY, December 23. Luke 2 : 11. "For unto you is born this day a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." As the coming of a child oftens transforms a family, much more the coming of the Christ-Child transformed a world of families. Heavenly music heralded his coming. His star of Bethlehem burst into sunrise on that holy night. It was the dawning of emancipation and redemption. Was it not difficult for the wise men and shepherds to realize that those baby lips would speak Godlike words, and that those little hands would wield a scepter over all worlds? Myriads, every century since, have been crying out, "Where is he that is born?" "O that I knew where I might find him!" I will bring him tears for pearls, consecration for gold, love for frankincense. You will delight to give to others as he loves to give to you, when you have made room for him in your heart.

O sweet Bethlehem Stranger! How thou hast solved the problem of our salvation! Thou hast made Tabor and Calvary and Olivet the highest hills of hope, toward which the world lifts up its eyes. Thy little fingers throttled the grim monster Death, and opened the gates of life. Thy precious cleansing blood washes away our sins, and thy hands shall wipe away all our tears. E. W. C.

Japan's Premiers Discuss America

CONTINUING MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS' LETTERS FROM THE ORIENT

Ex-Premier Okuma

ANYONE who expects to find in Marquis Okuma one who is feeling disappointment, or who is pessimistic over the trend of affairs in Japan, will be more disappointed than is the Marquis himself.

Mr. Gilbert Bowles, Secretary of the American Peace Society, who accompanied me to my interview with the ex-Premier, less than forty-eight hours after the installation of the new Ministry, started things going. For this I was duly thankful. I could not think of a diplomatic way to congratulate the Marquis on his status as a highly respected but private citizen.

"We are delighted to have this privilege of seeing you. We hope you are not tired out with the events of the last few days."

He said this in Japanese and I wondered what it was that made the Marquis straighten up and smile, not bravely, but truly and sincerely. The "Grand Old Man of Waseda" had become young in an instant, and although it was several minutes before what he said was translated, I knew right away how he felt.

"Tired? Not a bit of it. I feel like Pilgrim when the burden slid from his shoulders, or as I imagine the Americans did when their independence was won, and they began to drink in the wine of true freedom. Tired? Oh, no, it is not for me to be tired, but invigorated."

The chairs had been arranged before I arrived at the large house, set in its beautiful garden, where stone lanterns and a tiny pond add an Oriental touch to the velvety lawn, which reminded me of home. My chair faced the light, so that every change of my expression on my face could be plainly seen. To me, Marquis Okuma was a silhouette at least half the time. Where he learned his scrutinizing Sherlock Holmes tactics I don't know but I have the impression that every man who interviews the Marquis is regarded carefully by the shrewd diplomat, while he sits in that seat facing the light and trying to see at least as much in the strong face of the statesman as the latter reads in his own.

"How can the suspicious attitude in America toward the new ministry be allayed?" I asked, after we had chatted for a while.

Public Opinion Rules in Japan

"DR. ANDERSON was here yesterday and he asked the same question," was the reply. "My answer will be the same to you. Count Terauchi's connection with the army, and his work as Governor-General of Chosen when it was being annexed by Japan, have been very much overemphasized. He is pictured as a fire-eater and a despot. But he is really not an aggressive man at all. Nor is he a trouble-maker. His record has been that of trouble dispeller. Personally, I think no nation has cause to fear that Japan will be more aggressive under the new ministry.

"That is only my opinion," he added, "but this I know. Japan is not ruled by a small group of politicians, or by a ministry, but by public opinion. It has been so for many years. People say that Japan owed its emancipation and enlightenment to the Choshu and Satsuma clansmen. That is not so. Public opinion has been the ruling force in Japan since the inception of the present régime, and this force is getting stronger with every election and ministerial change.

"The change of ministry in Japan no more changes the attitude of the country toward other nations than does the change of Presidents in the United States. Your country is even now being blessed with election oratory. Attacks and counter attacks are being made. But that is party politics with you and with us. A change of officers is not a change of public attitude.

A Japanese View of Our Presidential Campaign

"PRESIDENT WILSON'S policy is being criticized in America now," the ex-Premier continued, "and if we are to believe election oratory, the Republican candidate is a more warlike man than the present executive. Personally, I think that Roosevelt and Hughes, who now criticize Wilson, would have done as he did if they had been in his place. Certainly he has steered that mighty nation free from disaster, and what more could the others have done? But the Japanese people are not concerned with the election in America, for not only is that domestic politics, but they know that a change of Presidents cannot change the traditional and actual friendship which exists between our two countries. America, like Japan, is ruled by public opinion, and not by a handful of politicians.

An epitome of the Americanization of Japan—a uniform, our national game, pep, a smile and a pose before the camera

"You have been in China. What is your opinion of the Chinese?" asked the old man after a pause, from behind a shield of smoke, which made him more of a silhouette than before.

"Individually, I have a very high regard for them," I answered. "I think they are destined to be great in modern history as they have been in the past. The problem of bringing such an unwieldy nation up to date is, however, so overwhelming that difficulties must compel slow progress."

A grunt of approval came from the center of smoke cloud.

"Individually," said the Marquis, "they ar very fine people. I respect them highly. We h had very many Chinese students in Waseda Univers and in all branches they are efficient. Even in scien in which they are thought to be lacking, they so times stand above our own students. But whe comes to cooperation and organization, there is wh the rub comes. They lack that talent. Individua they are honest and efficient; but collectively t are not only unable to organize with skill, but th are mysterious leaks of funds and shifting of respo bilities.

"Politicians and religious leaders in China h tried to diagnose this matter and prescribe the pro medicine. But the moral systems of China are th of pen and tongue, and not of heart and act. Th religions are book religions and are admirable as su But possibly it is only the Christian religion that give to them the medicine that will cure their dise Moral and spiritual medicine, such as that of Chr is needed to convert tongue and pen thoughts i modern organization and honesty. Chinese politici and religious teachers have failed to make a str organization in China. Perhaps Christianity a other methods are necessary."

I did not attempt to argue in favor of my frie the Chinese, but I followed up one point the Premier made.

"We hear a great deal now from Baron Shibusa Judge Gary and others about Japanese and Ameri cooperation in China," I ventured to remark, " why not complete the triangle? We are all seek for friendship. Japan-American, Sino-Japanese, a Sino-American. Why not combine the three? Th is not enough talk of recognizing the small but grow number of Chinese technical students, who, as y say in Waseda, are surpassing the Japanese and, a know, in Cornell, Columbia and M. I. T. are surpa ing the Americans. Can we not find a place for th in plans of Japanese-American cooperation in Chi I believe in this cooperation thoroughly, and hope will increase; but what of the trained Chinese in th own country?"

The Marquis agreed, giving place in his reply to part trained Chinese would play in the scheme things. He emphasized the fact that America money, that Japan has skilled undermanagers, a that, until China has succeeded in establishing ord Japan stands ready to protect the interests of all c cerned, including the Chinese, who are seeking t development, and who would have to ensure the saf of the capital invested. But in the midst of this, the integrity and interests of China would uppermost, as Japan must have China's friendship ensure her own future. She has no ambition to absorbed by the all-engulfing Chinese nation, as many conquerors have been.

"Of course," he added, "one of the surest ways ensure this cooperation and friendship between three nations would be the joint activities of the c zens of all in a common plan of commercial devel ment."

A Notable Message to America

THE slanting rays of the afternoon sun were n creeping toward us, and I asked whether, closing, Marquis Okuma had any message that might care to give to the Christian Herald reade He thought a little as though to give weight to reply before he answered.

Baron Shibusawa entertains Judge and Mrs. Elbert H. Gary at a garden party Mr. Zumoto looks at you just beyond Mrs. Gary “America, as I have often said, is the only nation earth that had a truly spiritual birth. In conform- to modern principles of government and law, the panese have made great progress along material es. It is only sixty years since we were a feudal tion. We have done in that time what some na- ns have taken five centuries to accomplish. But r real development has chiefly been along the mate- l side. We still have the moral and spiritual faults a feudal civilization, even, in some cases, augmented contact with the faults of the most modern capitals. r material changes have been remark- le. But heart changes take place more wly than do those of the hand. While nning a place as a nation of material gor, we have lagged in spiritual and ral growth.

“From the first, we have looked to nerica as our spiritual and moral ad- er, even as from her we have copied d developed our material side. Her ssionaries have come with her business n, and have been as willingly received. it it takes longer to build a man than a chine, and a woman than the loom she ds. We have had to win a material ce and we have done so. Now, like the n whose riches have come without lture, we miss the moral and spiritual which we need to round out our ex- ience as individuals and as a nation.

“For this we still look to America, ose foundation was in soul liberty and e spiritual freedom of Puritanism. rung from such a beginning, we have ken her as our spiritual guide. But, as have come to gain material strength, have discovered flaws in the spiritual of America, and some of us have seen in r acts a selfishness and lack of applica- n of the Golden Rule which we deplore.

“We know from experience the power the shallow politician to foul the ters of national purity, and to hide tue beneath a show of race prejudice d greed. But in America, founded in religion and nceived in freedom, we deplore this weakness, ght as it may be.

“So it is with the greatest joy that I hear that a igious paper has so many readers of the honest but mble class, and the fact that your paper has so ny implies that there are many others who are iving to keep alive the heritage which has been America's from the first. Against the force of such enlightened opinion and ennobled action which has resulted in relief work such as helped us in our famine of fourteen years ago, the machinations of shallow and short-sighted politicians cannot prevail. My hope is that America may live true to her birthright, secured by the stern Puritans who braved danger and starvation to establish soul freedom. And I want to congratulate your paper and its readers in the part that they as Christians will play in this evolution toward a truly Christian state.” My interview was over.

The New Premier a Strong Personality

BOTH Marquis Okuma and Count Terauchi are partially disabled. The former lost a leg in his desire to make possible the assistance of foreign judges in the Supreme Court of Japan. The present premier shakes hands with his left, because a rifle ball, fired at the young captain in the Imperial Guards in the battle of Tawarazaka in 1877 during Saigo's rebellion, deprived him for life of full use of his right arm. Marquis Okuma was wounded for his friendship for the foreigner. Field Marshal Count Terauchi was wounded in supporting his government against attack by revolutionaries. It is not, then, remarkable that critics expected Count Terauchi to put Japan before everything else when he assumed the premiership. He is first of all a Japanese citizen and a champion of her nationalism. His efficiency is that of unquestioning loyalty to the government in which he holds the highest elective office.

Just as a friend told me, “There is more patriotism in the cork leg of Marquis Okuma than in the two legs of most men,” one might say, “Count Terauchi can grasp the mighty problems of government more securely in his left hand than many men can in both.” Count Terauchi is by nature a member of the ruling class.

It has been said that the new premier has lost friends through his dislike of journalists. If he disliked me, he carefully concealed the fact. He was not enthusiastic, but he was perfectly cordial. He answered, in a direct and kindly way, every question asked. He is the Kitchener of Japan, a man who wins respect, not by being a mixer, but by being a master of efficiency. He has ideas and the power and determination to carry them out. When he said to me, “I have no desire but to perpetuate the friendship which has existed between Japan and the United States since my youth,” I could not doubt his sincerity for an instant. And he can be trusted to do his share to make that honored tradition an actuality during his term of office.

WEARING a plain military uniform decorated only with the badge of marshal and the grand cordon of the Rising Sun and Paulownia, with patent leather shoes, and spurs, Count Terauchi looked what he is: a man of action. Although he speaks perfect French, we spoke through an interpreter in Japanese and English. The premier followed every phrase I used and occasionally nodded or assented in Japanese to some statement before it was translated to him.

CHAPTER XVI

WHICH I FIRST VISIT THE BOWERY MISSION

AFTER one of these strike-breaking jobs, which had netted me a considerable sum of money, I returned to New York d began to spend it. It proved to be most fearful debauch. It lasted ny days, during all of which time I s a “good fellow.” If you've got a lar to spend you're a “good fellow” vn there, but when you've got a “roll low,” you meet scores of “friends” u've never seen before. They come d go with the “roll,” like wolves with stray sheep.

came to my senses finally, alone and niless, in a back alley-way. I had a zy feeling that I hadn't spent or nbled all the money I'd started in th the night before. I was sick, too, ich added to my suspicions that my oll” had been “lifted.” Some one d reached me.

A man in the condition I was in that orning needs, if ever he needs it, a od stiff drink. It quiets him, and if he n't get it, he is liable to go clean azy. Men like that are given a drink, d at longer and longer intervals other inks. Otherwise they would injure emselves or others. Somebody gave e a hooker! It pulled me together a t. And then a bartender where I had ropped a “bunch” a few nights rlier gave me another.

Suddenly I thought of my wife, and en I remembered that I hadn't paid r a visit in a long time. Probably she d a few dollars saved. I needed oney badly. What was my wife for, not to take care of me? So I looked r up. She was in desperate straits, from worry and lack of proper food nd days and days of fruitless searching r work—for any sort of work that would bring the price of a loaf of bread and a bottle of milk.

She had even been forced to go on the street and beg!

Did my heart melt? Did I get down on my knees and ask forgiveness?

In a moment of madness, after learning that she had no money to give me, I left her without so much as a good-by!

How I got back to the Bowery I don't know. I was blind with rage and the effects of booze—sore clear through with anger and hate. I hated myself! I hated my wife! I hated the world! I must have money! I must have money! This kept ringing in my ears.

And then I lay down and slept. It was a long time before I awoke, and when I did, I found myself in an empty wagon in an alley.

I was sober now—sober but sick. Not too sick, however, to begin new plans for money—money for drink, money for gambling. If I could pick one winner I could get a start, and with a start, even if it was only a small one, I could beat the bookmakers. I knew it! I was surer of it then than ever before!

I thought and planned with wits born of desperation, for somehow or other I felt this was pretty near my last fling. But I couldn't arrive anywhere. I couldn't see a start. I thought and thought, but only in circles! I couldn't do anything alone. Alone? Why need I try alone? Hadn't I a wife? What was a wife for if not to help me and care for me? Hadn't she always done it? Wouldn't she continue to do it? I knew her well enough to know she would!

I don't know what put the idea of writing to her in my mind. But that's what I decided to do. I hadn't done it, mind you, in years. I had no writing materials nor a stamp. It was early in the morning, and I could borrow what I needed, maybe, from a bartender, so off I went. On the way I met an acquaintance and told him what I wanted. He couldn't help me himself, but he told me that if I would go up to the Bowery Mission, near Rivington Street, and tell them I wanted to write to my wife—that I wanted to go home and be good to her again—they would give me the materials and a place at which to write.

I turned in my tracks and headed for the Bowery Mission!

I want you to get clearly in mind the mental state I was in and the purpose of my errand. I was on my way again to make my poor wife “produce.” Remember my physical condition—it had been wrecked by booze and wrong living. I was a scoffer and a jeerer at everything that savored of religion. I didn't believe there was a square man in the world. I would have thought no more of killing a man than of laughing at one. In reform schools and prisons I had been told of brotherly love one hour a week by a paid chaplain, while I was being beaten on my bare back, strung up by my thumbs or confined in dark, damp dungeons during the rest of the week by other paid state officials. Why should I have believed that this one state employee—the chaplain—should be on the level any more than the others?

TO me a man with religion was a “bug,” a “mut,” a “mollycoddle.” I could stand for anything but that! But if I could get what I wanted at that mission, I'd be a fool not to go.

I stood outside looking at the joint and laughing to myself. A bunch of “suckers,” I called them. They were mission stiffs, I thought. Somebody was putting up the dough—some cracked old “nut”—and those fellows down here were getting away with it good and soft. I'd put one over on them.

I went upstairs along with the other men. It was very clean, much cleaner than anything I'd seen in a long time. At the top of the stairs was a large room with a lot of poor fellows sitting around. A young lad came out of an office and said, “Good morning. What can I do for you?” I told him, and he pointed to a chair which he told me to take and he'd talk with me in a few minutes. Things were going all right, I thought. I hadn't met as easy a bunch to work in a long time. It was like taking candy from a child. The warmth of the coal stove felt good, too. It was a cinch!

But the young fellow who was coming right back didn't come, and I began to get leery, and then I got sore! I was about to start something to show them I was wise, when I felt a hand on my shoulder.

They'd pulled a trick on me! I was pinched! I knew all the time these fellows with religion were crooked! I wanted to make a break and beat it, when I heard a voice behind me, a soft kindly voice.

“Do you want a job?”

I looked up, and there stood a little old fellow with ruddy cheeks, dressed in a neat business suit, and I knew he must be one of those in authority.

I looked about the room again. There were certainly twenty other men there doing as I was doing—waiting. Why had I been asked that question ahead of the others? What was this fellow trying to hand me? Something “queer”? I didn't owe him anything. Why should he want to do anything for me? He'd never seen me before, and after I'd gotten what I came for, he'd never see me again. I could have promised him that. What did he think I was? I looked at him again, and he smiled as he repeated the question.

“Do you want a day's work?”

Before I realized what I was doing I'd said “yes.” It slipped out before I knew it. I didn't even say "sir," or "thank you." Work! What did I want with work? How much honest work had I ever done? And then an idea flashed across my mind. I'd look the ground over. Maybe I'd find a chance to get next to something. Maybe this job might help me to the coin I was after.

They asked me my name and a few other questions and entered the information in a book of register. A card was given me introducing me to the firm to whom I was being sent, together with five cents for carfare.

I was on my way to work! I went down stairs in a stupor. I remember how I laughed at myself for having been in a mission, and how I had fooled them. I've seen lots of other men since who thought they'd fooled the Mission, when in reality they were the ones who were fooled, only they didn't know it at the time, any more than I did.

CHAPTER XVII

HARD MANUAL LABOR—A NEW SENSATION

THE address on the card read "Seventh Avenue near Seventeenth Street." They had wanted help of a temporary sort, to carry lumber, and so they had telephoned the Free Labor Bureau of the Bowery Mission. And because I was a big-framed and strong-looking man, Charlie Thompson (I learned his name on my way down stairs) had asked me if I wanted work.

Here I was at the place and here was the lumber—a big pile of it. It was noon-time, and it certainly didn't look like the picking was going to be good, for only laboring men were to be seen. Surely carrying that lumber all day was going to be no picnic. I was looking for something soft. All this makes it very difficult for me to understand why I took off my coat and, with rolled-up sleeves, went to work. It proved even harder than I thought it would; but I kept on and was glad when the whistle blew at quitting time. The nickel for carfare I'd saved, for I knew it would buy me two early morning drinks and get me a place of shelter.

That morning, before I'd left the Mission, I'd promised Charlie Thompson that I'd come into the service that night. I kept thinking about it all day. I'd made that promise like I'd made hundreds of similar ones to my wife—with not the slightest idea of ever making good. Every promise I'd ever made her I'd forgotten at once. But I kept thinking all day of my promise to that mission stiff!

You know, I was about as wise as they came, or I thought I was. Nobody ever could teach me anything. I had to be shown, and that about a dozen times. I was from Missouri if ever a man was. I was suspicious of everything and everybody. A thing I couldn't understand was "phony" and a good thing to keep away from. I loathed everything churchy—all connected therewith I viewed as crooked. I tell you all this in repetition because you meet so many "cons." I wish every convict in the country could know my story. I believe it would make their "come-back path" look brighter and easier to travel.

When I quit my work at 5:15 I was almost done up. My back ached and my arms ached—ached like they'd never ached before. I was hungry as a bear. I could hardly wait to reach a meal. Seventy-five cents they had paid me, and they also told me I could have another day's work if I wanted it. Yes, I wanted it, and told them I'd show up. Work started at 7:30. I laughed at myself when I thought of it. Me at work at 7:30 carrying lumber!

A heavy meal for fifteen cents made me feel a lot better. When before had I gone a whole day without a drink? It seemed like a year when I thought of it. My throat was cracking open for one. The price was in my pocket. It was there before my dinner, and I'd gone by three saloons before I reached the restaurant. How do you account for it? I hadn't done a thing like that in years!

On my way from dinner to the Bowery were at least fifty saloons. I entered only one, and ordered and drank only two slugs—whiskies. Mind you, I wasn't trying to quit the stuff, yet the fact remains that I only had two drinks. The previous night I'd have stayed till the eighty cents were gone. Then, however, I spent just ten cents.

TELL me, if you can, what took me to the service at the Mission that night? What made me keep my promise to Charlie Thompson? Why did I keep a first promise to a stranger? At any rate, when the doors opened at seven, there I was, well up in the line. It was just the time when usually I was getting tanked up down the street. thought of that, but decided to stay a see what kind of a show they ran. A it was some show, believe me! I do remember ever being so interested a amused in my life. But I sim couldn't understand it. I thought t men were plumb crazy as, one after a other, they stood up and gave their t timony. One had been a thief, he sa and later a down-and-out, but had l all of it since he'd given his heart God. I thought some one had tipp him off about me, and he was taking chance on ringing me in as one of th bunch of old women! I was sure ev man who spoke was paid for doing Surely no man in his right senses wo get up and do it for nothing. They every one of them, talked about same thing—brotherly love! Brothe love be hanged! How far would th stuff take me? What did I want w love? Love was meant for women— men. Whisky was good enough for

At any rate, I stuck the meeting o although I was disgusted long befor was over. Along with all the res some three hundred—I filed do stairs, where we all got a handou coffee and a big fresh roll. Again a again I asked myself what it all mea It cost money—300 rolls and 300 c of coffee, 365 times a year. I spoke t lad near me about it, and he said t from Thanksgiving to Easter, at o'clock in the morning, the Mission a Bread Line, where they fed upwa of a thousand men. That cost a more. And then I remembered Labor Bureau away up stairs. T cost more money. They didn't cha me a cent for the job they got for You know, I didn't know anyth about the Settlement in the Bronx, the Mother Bird Memorial Farm up the Croton Lake watershed.

As I went up out of the breakf room to the street, I decided I'd co in again the next night and see the sh all over again. I told Thompson would. They certainly were a s shelled bunch. I ought to be able make it worth my while.

By Charles Irvin Junkin

"DO you believe in Santa Claus?"
I asked my Uncle Billy;
And he said, "'Course I do, you goose,
And don't you be so silly!"

And Brother Tom, he thinks he's smart,
And he said, "Jane MacPherson!
I grieve to state the simple truth,
There isn't no sich person!"

And father said, "Well, now, my dear,
You'd better ask your mother!"
And mother said, "Now, never mind!
Don't listen to your brother!"

And grandma said, "You wait and see!"
And kept right on a-rocking;
But anyhow, when Christmas comes,
I'm going to hang my stocking!

Armageddon: The Great Climax of Revelation

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

IN a previous article it was shown from the Scriptures that our Lord Jesus Christ is to return again to the earth personally and visibly. The plain declarations of Scripture, the meaning of particular words descriptive of the event, and an apprehension of the collateral events associated with his coming, all combine to demonstrate that fact.

But nothing was said as to the probable time of his coming. Every reader of the New Testament is aware of the caution necessary to be observed there, for the times and the seasons "the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts 1 : 7). As Archbishop Trench once happily expressed it: "It is a necessary element of the doctrine of the second coming of Christ that it should be possible at any time, that none should consider it improbable in theirs."

For a quarter of a century the writer has made as careful a study of the prophetic Scriptures as he is capable of doing, but he knows of no event necessary to intervene before the Lord's second advent. In consequence he is looking for him every day, and seeking divine grace that when He shall appear he may have confidence, "and not be ashamed before Him at His coming" (I John 2 : 28). But there are certain events associated with His coming that are quite clearly revealed. The first is the translation of the church, to which Paul specifically refers in I Thess. 4 : 13 18. He was comforting that people in the earthly loss of some of their number, for whom they were deeply sorrowing. Their sorrow was apparently not because they doubted the fact of the resurrection or a future life, but because they felt that the living saints at the time of Christ's return would have some advantage over those who had died.

To reassure them he says, "that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall in no wise precede them which are asleep"; for when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven," "the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

It will be the experience of Enoch and that of Elijah repeated again in the case of the whole company of the elect; and from the earthly side it constitutes the great hope of the church or the body of Christ in all the centuries. Compare Gen. 5 : 24; Heb. 11 : 5; II Kings 2 : 11; 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52.

A SECOND event of great importance relates to the future of the Jews on earth. Indeed, taking the Old and New Testaments together, the greater part of the predictions concerning the second advent relates to that people and their earthly affairs. This is not because they are so worthy or important in themselves (for they are a small people compared with other nations), but because of God's purposes in them for the blessing of the world.

These purposes were set forth in an earlier contribution to these columns, under the title of "The Psalms in the Light of the War." It was shown that God had chosen Israel to be a repository for his revealed truth in the world, a channel for the incoming of the personal Redeemer Jesus Christ, and a national witness to himself before the other nations, in order to their conversion and subjection to his Son.

The first two of these purposes Israel has fulfilled, but in the third she has failed. This failure is the cause of the disturbance and unhappiness in the Gentile nations today, as well as the explanation of Israel's own dispersion and suffering among them.

But God will not have it so forever, and his word shall not return unto him void (Isa. 55 : 11). The prophets, from Moses to the apostle John, are a unit in proclaiming the final return of the Jews to their own land (Deut. 30 : 1–10; II Sam. 7 : 8–16; Ps. 9; Isa. 2 : 1–5; Jer. 32 : 36–44; Dan. 2 : 44; Amos 9 : 11–15; Zech. 12 : 9, 10; Matt. 24 : 15–28; Acts 15 : 14–17; Rom. 11 : 25–29; Rev. 7 : 4 8). At first they will return there in an unconverted state, so far as the acceptance of Jesus as their Messiah is concerned; and they will rebuild their temple and renew the worship of God somewhat after the manner of their fathers. But this will prove to be the hour of "Jacob's trouble," such as that people have never before known; and yet "for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened" (Matt. 24 : 22). Those days shall be shortened, because the Lord—who already shall have come to the air, as the writer understands the Scriptures, and unto whom the church, which is his body, shall have been caught up—shall now come with his saints, "and his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zech. 14 : 4).

The second coming of Christ, in other words, is not only an event, but marks a period of certain stages, or may be likened to a drama with several scenes. For example, a period will elapse between the translation of the church to meet the Lord in the air, and the coming of the Lord with his saints to the ea How long a period is not revealed; if this interpretation be correct, it be sufficient for the reestablishmen Israel in Palestine, and the developm of those movements leading up to third great event associated with second coming.

THIS event is the judgment on Gentile nations, culminating in battle of Armageddon. The Gen nations meant are those of Christendo and chiefly those that encircle and m be said to control the Mediterran Sea. How far others, including our o nation on the one hand, or the heat nations of Asia and Africa on the oth may be involved in the crisis, is not vealed. That may depend upon int national alliances or affiliations yet come.

But why these judgments on the G tile nations? For answer, one mig recur to the Tower of Babel (Gen. 1 since from that time of the first attem at a world-monarchy, the nations ne have served God. But a more conve ient starting-point is about 600 B. when Israel, because of her disobedien was temporarily rejected as God's s vant on the earth, and a divine trans of dominion was made to the kingd of Babylon and her successors Kings, chapters 24 and 25; Jer. Dan. 2). The "times of the Gentile began then. The kingdom of Babyl was succeeded by that of the Medes a Persians, and that by the kingdom Greece, and that by the Roman empi which, as the great Tregelles says, "st bears sway, though in a divided con tion."

This last-named empire, rough aking, stretches from the Euphrates the Irish Sea, and includes a part of rkey and Palestine on the east; rica and Egypt on the south; Greece, Balkans and part of Austria- ngary on the north; Italy, France, ain, Portugal and Great Britain on west. It will be brought together ain, according to the prophets, and ain go up under one head against the red city of Jerusalem. Twice before that city been besieged by the Gen- powers (under Nebuchadnezzar, C. 600, and under Titus A.D. 70), and each occasion has she been overcome, d on the last, "trodden down of the ntiles" until now (Luke 21 : 24). t in the crisis to come the tables will turned; for "then shall the Lord go th, and fight against those nations, as en he fought in the day of battle" ech. 14 : 3).

Such is the battle of Armageddon, etold in Rev. 16 : 12-16, and de- ibed in Rev. 19 : 11-21. Limitation space prevents any enlargement upon immediate causes, the personnel of army, the rise of its commander-in- ief, figuratively spoken of in Scripture the "Beast," or the results that will low it. But this can be said: that it is the great earthly event of which so much is spoken in the Bible. Besides the Scriptures already indicated, see Ps. 2 : 10; 45; 46; 47; 50; 68; 110; Isa. 10 : 20-34; 11; 24; 63 : 1-6; Dan. 7 : 9-14; Joel 3; Matt. 34 : 15-30; Acts 17 : 30, 31; 2 Thess. 1 : 7-10; Jude 14, 15, and other places. It is the great event for which the world waits without knowing it. As Gaebelein says, in his concise but illuminative exposition, it is the great climax of Revelation. It is God's vindication of his Son. "The New Theology has been speaking about 'the vanishing Christ,' by which is meant the denial of his deity, h's virgin birth, his sacrificial death, and his physical resurrection. But at the very moment when apostate Christendom will be rejoicing that the Christ of the Bible has altogether vanished, he will return as the vanquisher of his enemies and the vindicator of his truth"

"The armies which are in heaven follow him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean" (19 : 14). These are not angels, but saints. The former accompany him (II Thess. 1 : 7-10), but as the reapers in the judgment and the gatherers of Israel (Matt. 13 : 39; 24 : 31). The saints accompany him to reign (I Cor. 6 : 2; Col. 3 : 4).

It remains to say a word about the place. "Armageddon" identifies a mountain rising from the plain of Esdraelon, or the valley of Jezreel, where many a battle has been fought in the history of Israel. Indeed, to quote another, "it has been a chosen place for encampment in every contest, from the days of Nebuchadnezzer to the distant march of Napoleon into Syria. Jews, Gentiles, Saracens, Crusaders, Egyptians, Turks, Arabs, and warriors of every nation under heaven have pitched their tents there, and have beheld their banners wet with the dews of Tabor and Hermon." It is important to note that no point in Russia, Austria, the Balkans, Germany, France, Italy or Great Britain answers to Armageddon, or can be substituted for it. Of course, the developments of the present war might shift the scene of battle from the European continent to that of Asia, and create an entirely different situation from the present; but we are now considering only the situation as it is.

However, not only must there be a shifting of the scene of battle before the present conflict could be identified with Armageddon, but there must be also a new alignment of the nations. The Triple Entente is composed of Russia, Great Britain and France; but since Russia was not part of the Roman empire, it would seem that sooner or later she must withdraw from the other two. The Triple Alliance is, or was, composed of Germany, Austria-Hungary and Italy; but Germany was not part of the Roman empire; hence, for the same reason, she must withdraw from the other two. The whole of Austria-Hungary was not in the Roman empire; hence are we to look for a division there? Ireland was not in the Roman empire—does that mean eventually home rule?

A student of prophecy must not be a prophet; hence discretion restrains any forecasting of our own; but things are just now happening on the continent of Europe that might speedily bring about such a realignment of the nations, and in that sense make a situation which would soon mean Armageddon.

Nevertheless we, who believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, are looking, not for Armageddon, but for him, "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe in that day"(II Thess. 1 : 10).

Soul-Winning in the Trenches

ohn, a good soldier of Jesus Christ

SERGEANT JEAN—"our little son Jean," as he always called himself—had told us, when we saw him upon our visit at the front in March of this year: "I have written a little letter, which I carry always in my tunic pocket, telling my commandant that if anything happens to me and I should be killed, he is to inform you at once, at London."

It was a serious Jean who addressed to us these words; but when he saw the sadness in our faces he finished cheerily: "But don't you fear; nothing is going to happen to your little son Jean."

It was a scant two months afterward that, in London, we received a fateful letter with the stamp of the commandant outside. It told us that little Jean d gone home; and even as we read the letter rough our tears, we found our hearts rejoicing. For an loved his Lord, and throughout the months since r first meeting, he had been faithfully serving his w-found Saviour and Friend.

Little Jean had gone from us, but how about his orner of the vineyard" in the trenches of Flanders? od was not forgetting, and the next week after ceiving the commandant's letter we had another m a corporal in Jean's company. This is what we ad, with hearts full of thanksgiving:

"Perhaps you will remember that I was with Jean London, last November, when you st met him there. Jean has been my st friend; I shared all his joys and s sorrows; I seconded him in the ble mission that he undertook at ur direction. My beloved Jean fell the mud of the trench at my side. ow God has his soul, and me—I am one. But I desire to take up and rry on the work that he has gone way and left unfinished. I read in the ible, 'If we knock it shall be opened,' I come knocking at your door for estaments and Gospels with which to rry on this work."

As we read there came the picture of Roman relay race, the first runner ving finished his bit, handing the ghted torch on to his fellow who ould take up the race and complete . So Corporal Lambert took up an's work with courage and devotion nd we praise God for what he is doing mong his comrades in the trenches. rom other quarters, too, along the elgian front, comes good news as to he progress of the Belgian soldiers' Scripture League," whose members aily read in the little Testaments that have been iven them, and the success of the boys' soul-winning ork. One boy, Constant, writes: "This week the ord has blessed my labors and it is with the most appy feelings that I send you the lists of those who ant to join the League and to have Testaments. ou see, thanking our Lord again, a lot of my companions have found the truth and the real way to heaven." Another boy writes that he has gathered sixty men together for daily counsel and prayer.

Another, who is one of the thirty thousand Belgian soldiers interned in Holland among whom a real revival has broken out, writes: "I have received the package of Gospels and Testaments for distribution. It is with the greatest joy that I have distributed all these books, and that I search for new members for the League, and our Lord has aided me much. I do not know how to tell you how I am changed in my own life, since the day that I gave myself to him who loves us and who is always ready to pardon the poor sinners."

All of the hundreds of letters that come from Belgian soldiers would be interesting reading, but the simple faith they evince in Jesus as their Saviour, and their touching gratitude for the gift of the Word, are beautifully exemplified in the following: "In the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ I take the respectful liberty to write to you these words, to pray you to take note of my souche de membre (the stub of the Scripture League card). I have already received from a comrade the Testament, which I find to be an allayer to my sorrow, a comforter that never leaves me. It is the healer of my sufferings, and since I have told my comrades about my Testament, all desire to have one also. Be pleased to send me then as soon as possible some more Testaments."

Peter, the hero of his regiment, a member of a noble family, speaks five languages. He was converted in London while on a furlough, and went back to develop as a mighty soul-winner. It was Peter who was the real founder of the Scripture League. He has been having some interesting experiences of late. He sends this message: "Tell the good people of America what a lot of people in Belgium are still in the darkness and need to be dragged out of it."

"We have placed over 100,000 Gospels and Testaments in the Belgian army"

He also writes that John, his second convert and zealous co-laborer for Christ, has been decorated with a medal and war cross for valor and good conduct. John is a Red Cross man, and must carry the wounded from out the line of fire. Peter also tells us that the League is "all right," only that, unfortunately, several members have lately been wounded and killed. We know that practically every one of Peter's members have been won by him for Christ.

Now as to his experiences. One day a Belgian soldier approached Peter, telling him he had heard he was a Protestant, and he wanted some explanations about the Bible. Peter soon enlisted him for the League and gave him a New Testament, and answered his questions. The young man told him that before the war he had been a seaman, and in visiting different ports in England, he had been attracted by the different seamen's missions and other like institutions, and that always when in the harbor he attended daily and nightly such services. It was an easy matter for Peter to lead this boy to Christ.

Not long after receiving this letter from Peter, he sent another, relating to this same seaman whom he had led to Christ. In it he said: "The young seaman of whom I wrote in my last letter was wounded a couple of days ago, a few yards from the place where I was. He was such a calm boy that, though seriously wounded, he told me about the nice things he'd read in his Bible the day before, and even while he sat on my back, as I carried him to the Red Cross post near the trenches, he spoke to me and promised me to do his best and tell the other wounded about Christ and the Bible as soon as he arrived in the hospital."

One day, when the boys were gathered together for a little rest back of the lines, one told the others about a song he had learned. At the beginning of the war he had lived for some months as a refugee in England before volunteering for service. The lady where he lived, as Peter put it, "had the good custom of reading the Bible every day and singing hymns, etc." As the boy did not understand English, he got nothing from the reading of the Bible nor the singing of the hymns, except that he was much struck with one of the latter, which he heard sung every day, and learned the words—which meant nothing to him—by heart.

Peter and the others were naturally curious to hear this song, so at Peter's invitation the boy offered to sing it for them. "He was so in earnest, as if he understood what he sang," Peter wrote, "and you can know how I was touched by the song, which was:

"Jesus, Saviour, pilot me
Over life's tempestuous sea;
Unknown waves before me roll,
Hiding rock and treacherous shoal.
Chart and compass come from thee;
Jesus, Saviour, pilot me."

"How glad he was," concluded Peter, "when I gave him a French Testament, I can hardly tell you. He is reading it daily, and now he thanks God that circumstances led him to that good lady who showed such an example of Bible reading. He was wishing, while on the front, to possess a Bible, and now he's got it, and he's a good boy, and I believe Jesus will 'pilot him over life's tempestuous sea.'"

So writes Peter from his daily experiences in soul-winning, and ends up his letter with his usual "I pray God to bless the American friends for all they are doing for the Belgian soldier."

The Time Ripe for Mediation

EVERY passing week makes it more clearly the duty of the United States to take the initial step with a view to bringing about peace in Europe. Peace sentiment is no longer sporadic but epidemic. All the nations involved, combatant and non-combatant, are surfeited with war and would welcome any opportunity to end the slaughter.

Everywhere it is conceded that the contending forces, while each laying claim to victory in turn, really make so little progress that the prospect of anything like a decision being reached is hopelessly remote. They can see nothing ahead but years of waste, slaughter and devastation, of hunger and intensified suffering, with national bankruptcy and ruin at the end.

In view of this appalling prospect, why should not America take up the task, which it owes as a duty to humanity, of making a sincere effort to stop the madness which is destroying Europe?

We know that statesmen and publicists, and a comparatively small class who do not represent the mind of the world, talk and write learnedly of the bases of settlement, and the disadvantages of a present peace. Of what advantage will a long-delayed peace be to the millions who will be bereaved meanwhile? Will it be an advantage to those multitudes who will surely be added to the endless roll of widows and orphans, if the war is prolonged another six months, or even three months? How will the suggestion of a deferred peace appeal to the poor fellows in the trenches, who know that their bones will very likely be bleaching in the winter snows, if this war goes on much longer?

Potentates, premiers, politicians and others, who talk of the bases of peace which must first be established before peace can come, simply confuse the greater issue. Such talk is like dust thrown in the air to blind people to the one sole, urgent question. All that relates to territory, trade privileges, sea freedom, rehabilitated populations and the like, while important, are simply details that will not and never can be considered or adjusted until after the fighting has ceased. It is no time now to talk of details, with half the world on pauper bread-tickets, and heart-sick of the ceaseless surge of armies that leave death and desolation behind them. They are weary of hearing of fruitless battles that mean more widows' weeds and more crying orphans.

Great Britain has been unable to repress the popular demand for peace which is now felt, not only in the island kingdom, but throughout the colonies. Germany, as the Imperial Chancellor has lately declared, is ready to meet any peace offers half way, and even to unite with a League of Nations as a guarantee against future wars. France, which has suffered much, would welcome peace, since it has the assurance that "what is French shall so remain." In Italy, the demand for an immediate peace is growing, in spite of official frowns and discouragements. The neutral nations have long waited in readiness to respond to our signal that will set the machinery of the peace movement definitely in motion. They look to us for leadership.

Why, then, should we hesitate when the way is clearly open for the performance of what has become a high and imperative duty? There are in Washington and Wall Street people who still say, "Peace now would be premature and a mistake. The war must go on to a definite decision before we can interpose our peace plea." Such an attitude is as monstrously inhuman as the war itself. It shows almost unbelievable indifference to human suffering. Fortunately, it is not the attitude of the American people, nor of any but a fractional part of the whole. Our people are a unit, not for a theoretical peace movement, which shall expend itself in discussion without real action, but for some practical step to be taken now by our government, looking to the beginning of that beneficent policy of mediation for which we have been preparing these twenty-eight months, ever since the world-war began. Our people believe that for us to wait longer would be criminal—that our duty to God and our loyalty to our own best national ideals both urge us to action. Therefore, let us not hesitate, nor dream of waiting for the consummation of the tragedy.

President Wilson has many times proclaimed his love of peace, and his desire to advance the cause of international good-will. The country has accepted these declarations in good faith. Now, as the close of his first administration approaches, he has an opportunity of winning for this nation the world's lasting gratitude and that of generations to come, by making a Christlike endeavor to put an end to the tragedy. Will he do it and thus become the means of saving Europe?

The Climbing of the Hill

SOME weeks ago we told our readers of the journey we were about to take up the Hill Difficulty—that serious climb forced upon us by the increasing cost of manufacture, chiefly that of paper. Well, we are already pretty well on our way, and are fortunate in having plenty of pleasant company on the road. Helpful and kind they are, too, and generously courteous; for the Hill is a long one and steep in places, and we are fain to lean upon their strong arms, the value of which we have already proved many a time in past experience.

When we explained in our former article the reason of our compulsory climb up the Hill Difficulty, and invited aid, the responses came to us readily, all of them couched in such a cheery tone, and with the sentiment of right good fellowship running through every line, that we were vastly strengthened for the journey. Nor was there a single letter that was discouraging.

You may remember that in Bunyan's story of his climbing of the Hill, Pilgrim Christian met by the way two men named Timorous and Mistrust, who tried to dissuade him. We have none such fellows among those who are with us on this journey, which is a right good omen. On the contrary, we have the best of good company of the braver sort, as these letters, which we take from many others of the same tenor, show:

Miss H. A., Los Angeles, Calif., writes: "I hope you will find many friends among the Christian Herald Family who will be glad to help you climb the Hill Difficulty in paying the $2 a year. With best wishes for a Merry Christmas and a bright, prosperous New Year, I remain, an old friend of the Christian Herald Family."

"My precious paper that has helped me through sunshine and shadow many, many years," is the kindly expression of Mrs. S. J. P., a good friend in Arlington, Vt.

"I feel that I must have the Christian Herald; it is such a help in the family. May God bless you and enable you to go on with the great work you are doing," is the message from a friend in Lapeer, Mich.

"We love it in every way, from cover to cover," writes A. E. R., Lowell, Mich. "Long may it live to do good!"

Elder J. H. Burrows, Cainesville, Mo., sends this kindly message: "More than thirty years have endeared its weekly visits to my home. No other such religious paper in the world! Its religion encircles the earth, and woe and want appeal to its great sympathy."

A whole bookful of good will is comprehended in this little message from Miss L. A. L., La Grange, Tenn: "I cannot do without your good Christian Herald."

"We all love the Christian Herald. I have taken it for over twenty years. I feel that we would be lost without it. May God bless it more and more, is the prayer of my heart. I hope it may continue to go forth, spreading the good news of salvation to the hungry multitudes," writes Mrs. P. B. K., Glendale, Calif.

Mr. and Mrs. F. A. A., Richardton, N. D., send this letter, which is one well calculated to give new strength and encouragement to us as we climb the Hill: "The Christian Herald is such a constant pleasure to us that we cannot for a moment entertain the thought of giving it up, and we hope that other members of the Christian Herald Family hold the same kind thoughts for you, and will stand by you when you need their aid in your noble work."

And so with hundreds of others. But we have quoted enough to show how splendidly and loyally our friends are helping us up the Hill.

With such gracious helpers, it is little wonder that we are making good progress.

At certain stages of our journey thus far up the Hill Difficulty, we have been so struck with the excellent views presented from these elevations, that we wish others could share with us the pleasure they afford. At these heights, one sees in true perspective the right relations of things in the valley below. Besides, it stimulates us greatly to note the steady stream of climbers coming from every quarter and earnestly bent on helping us and cheering us by their good companionship.

By and by we shall take pleasure in letting you all know the issue of our climb, when the top of the Hill Difficulty is reached and our object is accomplished. But do not forget that you, too, who read this, are invited to join our pilgrimage. The strange thing about this Hill is that every step upward grows lighter than the one before, and that goodly numbers, marching together, greatly shorten the road.

And thus, with fresh accessions, day by day, our company, which set out as a little band of friendly pilgrims, is becoming a mighty multitude. So we praise God and take courage!

The Christmas Spirit

AS the Christmas season brings upon us its sw spiritual spell, the people of our country shou think deeply upon our duty in this world cri and earnestly seek a way to turn the warring peop to us as an arbiter for peace.

Shall we sit unmoved while the unending funeral Europe goes on?

May we not be eyes to them blinded by batt smoke? May we not be ears to them deafened the roar of guns? May we not be love to th obsessed of hate? May we not be reason to t unreasoning, strength to the stricken, and help to t helpless?

There are a thousand ways, a thousand organi tions, by which the human spirit, the peace spirit, t Christ spirit that is in us may find expression definite action. With our countless millions of prof out of the war we can immeasurably contribute to t relief of the war's suffering victims. We can, if we w show to the warring nations, every one, that neutrality, our sympathy, our generosity know dividing lines, but embrace them all in hum brotherhood.

As a non-combatant we have been silent regardi peace. But it is up to us to become a combatant this Christmas time—a combatant for Christ in world of chaos.

The kindly heart, ever since the world began, been the strongest force for peace. Battlements f and armaments fail, but love is irresistible. T world's hates and jealousies surrender to it, as t storm-clouds and the flying snowflakes vanish bef the sunshine.

We can, through generosity and justice, cause t hearts of all combatants to turn to this great repub as the sincere friend of all.

"The Call of the Wild"

PERHAPS no writer ever lived and wrote m closely in accordance with the title of his m popular book than did Jack London.

His life and writings were crude, but with a cruc ness, a strength and an energy that are very essent on the far frontiers of settlement, trade and culture.

This young adventurer, if not a genius, was at lea original and true to life as he knew it. He wrote o of his own hard experiences. He was not a skill refiner of gold, but a ready producer of the rou nuggets.

Civilization did not do its best for Jack London point of advantages and opportunities, and he m than repaid the obligation.

Federal Reserve Board and War Loan

WITH admirable timeliness and convinci logic, the Federal Reserve Board has issu a warning to banks and private invest against the war loans of foreign governments that a now being floated here. This gives official emphasis the views recently expressed in the Christian Hera on the subject. The Reserve Board points out th funds invested in these loans are liable to be tied for a long period. While the war lasts, liquidation w be impossible, and the process of commercial rea justment abroad may prove a tedious one, befo normal conditions can be restored. While disclaimi any intention of reflecting upon the financial soun ness of any nation, the Board in its statement sa it feels that > Member banks should pursue a policy of keeping themsel liquid; of not loaning down to the legal limit, but of mainta ing an excess of reserves—not with reserve agents, where th balances are loaned out and constitute no actual reserve, b in their own vaults or preferably with their Federal Reser banks. The Board believes that at this time banks should p ceed with much caution in locking up their funds in long-te obligations or in investments, which are short-term in form name, but which either by contract or through force circumstances may in the aggregate have to be renewed un normal conditions return.

The Board's caution is clearly prompted by a sen of duty to the public. It is not a matter of sentime or partisanship, but of business exclusively, since calls in question the wisdom of tying up banki funds and the means of individual investors inde nitely. The caution merits serious attention, alt gether irrespective of how one's sympathies may le in regard to the war. Besides, the Federal Reser Board has the specific duty of seeing that the ban meet all the requirements regarding their reserves, matter upon which the financial stability of the cou try largely depends.

Afraid of Burial Alive

FEAR of being buried alive led a woman of East Orange, N. J., to make provision in her will that an old friend should visit e vault in which her body should lie, d lift the lid of the coffin each day forty days after her death. Her will s offered for probate. It directed at an old family friend should make visits to the cemetery. r this service he was to get 00 from the estate. The alth laws forbid raising the of a coffin, but on legal vice the man visited the netery daily for forty days d saw that the casket had en untouched. He will t the $200 for the service. ow and then there is a se of a person being buried ve, which frightens certain rsons of nervous tempera- ent into a morbid appre- nsion. But the likelihood such a thing is so slight at it should not cause a ought. Body-stealing is ore common, but the laws d public sentiment are king such thefts more re. More important than e disposition of the body anything else on leaving e world is what is to become the soul. Christ the viour is ready to receive it d take it to his mansion. ne of the most distinguished Bible characters on dying pressed faith in God, and ve orders for the disposition his body. "By faith seph, when he died, made ntion of the departing of the children Israel; and gave commandment con- rning his bones." (Heb. 11 : 22.)

Stops Roosters' Crowing

THE movement for the suppression of noises has prompted a man to vent a device which prevents roosters om crowing. It is a cap on the head ith bands reaching back and bound the body, which prevents the fowl om stretching up his neck the full ngth, without which he cannot crow. he bird can use his beak to scratch and ck on the ground, but not to wake the ighbors early in the morning or dis- rb them through the day. We protest ainst this infringement of the rooster's rsonal liberty. God made him to ow, and how much good the exercise es him! Those who do not want to ar a rooster crow had better not keep ickens. The holding of the bird's ck down is a part of the same cruelty at reins the horse's head up. It might t be a bad idea if some one would vent a device to keep some people om sticking their heads up so high d crowing so loud. They had no rangement to keep roosters from crow- g in Bible times. There is this record one whose plaintive sound rebuked eter's denial of his Lord: "And Peter id, Man, I know not what thou sayest. nd immediately, while he yet spake, e cock crew." (Luke 22 : 60.)

New Rifle Bullet

A NEW armor-piercing bullet, which can be fired from the regulation pringfield rifle as well as from a ma- ine gun, was tried out on the Sandy ook proving grounds a few days ago. is a little thing of only .30 caliber. ired at a distance of fifty yards, the rojectile plowed through a sheet of eel three-quarters of an inch thick and then penetrated a silhouette target behind the steel plate. This bullet is the outcome of months of experiment and study on the part of some of the ablest officers in the ordnance corps of the army. The steel is encased in a lead cover which lubricates it in its penetration of metal. It is claimed that this bullet could go through twenty men standing one behind another. The value of these bullets, it is said, will be against armored motor cars, against troops hiding in houses or behind steel or in some kinds of trenches, and even against such machines as the British "tanks." It may be that the increasing deadliness of war machines in the air, earth and sea will be overruled by the Prince of Peace for the destruction of war itself, and that our men of genius may use their talents to discover new devices for industrial endeavor and the saving and not taking of human life, and that these words may apply to our time: "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth." (Ps. 46 : 9.)

Newsboy Assists Judge

ISADOR SCHLETTER, a sixteen-year-old newsboy of Passaic, N. J., who has saved $800 from the sales of his papers, was recently appointed to aid Judge Costello in a certain class of cases in the city court. His career will be utilized by the judge as an example for the wayward boys brought before the court. When the boy appeared before the judge in a recent case, the court asked him to come there again and tell the delinquent boys what it means to go right, and how he succeeded. Isador promised to prepare a little speech to deliver to the boys whenever the judge desired. What a credit this newsboy is to himself and the community! His humble calling has produced a large number of successful men. It requires energy, promptness, accuracy and honesty. Judge Costello, in asking Isador to appear as an example to help save the bad boys, recognizes one of the most powerful factors in the formation of human character. Christ came into the world as an example to show us what God is and what he desires us to be, and has promised His Holy Spirit to fashion our lives in the divine likeness. The process is here given: " We all, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." (II Cor. 3 : 18.)

Perishes in Swamp Mire

A HORRIBLE death, alone at night in a trackless swamp, where he gradually sank into the foul mire, while venomous snakes struck at his face, was the fate of a former resident of Golden, Colo., who escaped from a sheriff when being brought back from New Orleans to stand trial in Golden on the charge of horse stealing. The man, twenty-five years old, leaped through an open window of a Santa Fe train near Guthrie, Okla., when the express was making fifty miles an hour and passing a swamp forty miles square. It was nine o'clock at night and pitch dark. The train was stopped and the search begun. Traces of blood were found to the edge of the swamp a few yards away. Out in the dismal swamp moans and cries could be faintly heard, but these suddenly ceased, as he sank to his horrible death. Residents of the region say that if he had not perished by sinking in the mire the venomous snakes that infest the morass would have killed him. How much better for the poor fellow to have stood the trial, taken his punishment, and turned over a new leaf! This is a horrible story, and yet it illustrates the fatal plunge that many young men of twenty-five make into the dismal swamp of evil habit, lawlessness and crime, verifying this truth: "The wages of sin is death." (Rom. 6 : 23.)

25 Punctures from Tacks

WILLIAM L. DILL, motor vehicle commissioner of New Jersey, ordered the arrest of a party of automobilists in a car from another state who on a recent Sunday, it is alleged, scattered tacks along the Lincoln Highway near Newark. Tire punctures in twenty-five cases followed before an alarm could be given. The commissioner got the number of the car and has revoked the reciprocal right of the owner to operate a car through New Jersey. It is to be hoped that the authorities will find the vandals and punish them. The automobile has come to be a necessity. An important item of expense in its upkeep is the broken tire. The twenty-five punctured tires amounted to considerable money in hard cash. There are men and women who sow tacks in the roadway of life to wound the feet of their neighbors. They seem to take a delight in causing all the hurt and damage they can. "He shall make amends for the harm that he hath done, . . . and shall add the fifth part thereto, . . . and it shall be forgiven him." (Lev. 5 : 16.)

Newspapers in Library

AT least 1,500 people make daily use of the newspaper collection of the New York Public Library, which is one of its most important features. The war collection of papers from forty different European cities has been of deep interest to investigators and other readers. Of current papers there are 256 American and 73 foreign publications. The man at the information desk is a wonder in answering questions asked by visitors. To a delicate, weak-voiced woman he gives a paper in Greek; to an advertising agent a paper printed a hundred years ago with samples of advertising in that day; to a woman claiming to be heir to a large estate he gives the data asked for. And so out of the deep mine of his department he supplies treasures to the hundreds who seek his guidance. The "stack room" is the "behind the scenes" of the library and is closed to the public. Here are practically complete files of all the New York City newspapers and a fair-sized collection of papers from other cities, both domestic and foreign. There are copies of the New York Evening Post for 1801, the London Times for 1805, the London Chronicle of 1757, the Journal des Débats, Paris, of 1841, and numerous others. In the rapid movement of our modern civilization, and in the easy and swift communication with all parts of our own and other countries, knowledge is greatly diffused. "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." (Dan. 12 : 4.)

Girls Lived on Peanuts

UNDER a scientific experiment two girls lived for three months on nothing but peanuts. They were students of the University of California, acting under instructions from Professor M. E. Jaffa, head of the department of nutrition, who wanted to prove that peanuts were among man's most nutritious food products. The scientific experiment was a success. "We never felt better," said one of them, who insisted that their names be kept secret, "but I can't bear the sight of them now." The peanuts cost each girl fifteen cents a day, or $1.05 a week. This cut their expenses down to $4.20 a month, breaking the record for frugality on the campus. Nuts that grow on trees are ground into flour, from which palatable and nutritious bread is made. In the settlement of the food problem of the future, nuts, which can be produced in such quantities and so cheaply, may be adopted as an important article of food. Every created being lives by feeding. The soul feeds on God. Christ takes the food for the body as a type of himself as the food for the soul. "Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life." (John 6 : 35.)

The City of Golden Sands

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I AM in the Hotel Golden Gate, in the City of Golden Sands. I can look out of my window upon the beach from which fortunes have been washed with the salt water of the ocean, and all about me is the city of Nome, whose foundations are laid upon soil sprinkled with gold dust. Nevertheless, the view is as dismal as that of Poverty Flat. The hotel is an ugly, dreary barn of four stories, and it is golden only in the high charges for any petty service the guest may want. It costs me 10 cents to press the electric button which brings the bell-boy, and the bills for laundry are beyond computation.

The city of Nome is one of shreds and patches. The municipality is the raggedest I have yet found in Alaska. It has houses enough for 10,000 people, but its citizens are only one-third of that number. The buildings are of every description, and they are scattered along streets paved with plank, or gravel, or the sand of the seashore.

At the upper end is the Eskimo village. It is composed of tents, rude cabins and shacks of boards, the most of them put up by the placer miners when they were washing gold out of the ocean, and now occupied by squatters and Eskimos. The town proper is farther down the beach. The chief street is Front Street, a wide road paved with thick planks and lined with houses of one or two stories. Some of the buildings contain excellent stores, but there are many vacancies, and signs of "To Rent" are to be seen in every block. Nome is on the decline. Its population today is not one-tenth of what it was at the time of the great stampede. Like all placer-mining camps, it decreases with the washing out of the gold from the sands.

Nome lies right on the sea. I stood on Front Street today at high tide and threw a stone into the ocean. It ricocheted over a beach which was once a gold mine. Nome is bounded on the west by a strip of gold-bearing shore sixty feet wide and three miles in length, the sands of which were once mixed with gold dust. When this was discovered men came here by the thousands from all parts of the world to wash out the gold, and many took away fortunes. As the miners came in each picked out for himself a certain part of the beach. He drove in a stake where his feet stood and drew a mark on the sand on each side of him as far out as he could reach with a shovel, and this was his claim. This was the condition at the beginning, the claims being small. Nevertheless, out of such holdings 500 men took gold dust to the amount of more than $2,000,000, an average of $4,000 per man. For a distance of forty miles along the shore the sands were found to contain gold and the best pay was right here at Nome. Just west of the town two men cleaned up $3,800 in three days.

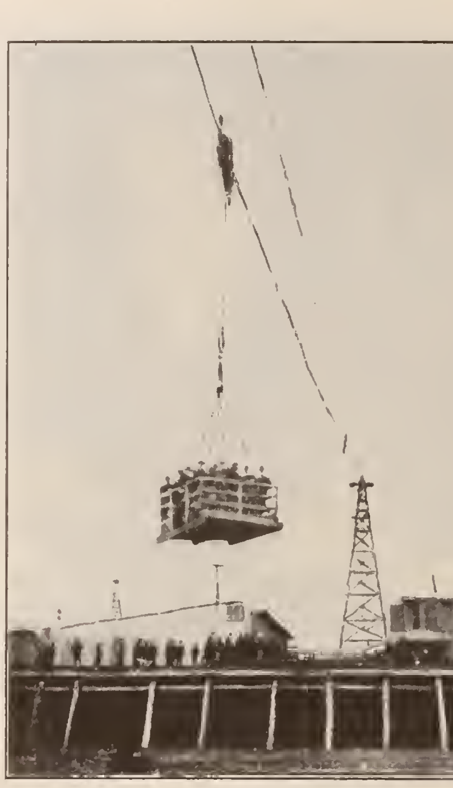
As I walked up the beach this afternoon I saw men still washing gold out of the sand. In one place they had put up an engine and stretched a rude tent above it. Connected with the engine was a pipe of about six inches in diameter which carried the water to the top of a sluice-box twenty or thirty feet high. The men were throwing the sand into the box and the stream was washing it away, the gold being caught in riffles or iron gratings in the bottom of the box.

Farther north some men were rocking out the gold in cradles, and there was patchy mining going on all along the beach. I saw a woman laying out a claim and fencing it with poles. She seemed to resent my inspection. She was a positive woman and did not want visitors.

I am told there is still gold in these sands in front of Nome and that more comes in at every high tide. One can get color almost anywhere by washing the sand. A low-grade deposit amounting to something like 50 cents a cubic yard is said to run for miles along the seashore, and machinery may yet be employed to get this gold out.

When you walk along the streets of Nome you may know you are walking on gold. I doubt not that there is a fortune under the planks of Front Street, and that if the buildings could be cleared away from the tundra on which they stand it could be mined at a profit. Some of the houses have cellars which yielded enough pay-dirt to cover the cost of the digging. The gold is scattered through the earth in patches or pockets, and there are probably many pockets yet undiscovered.

Back of Nome one can see the tailings from which the gold has been taken. There is a plain running from the shore to a low range of mountains. This plain is about four miles in width. It is composed of three ancient beaches which have grown up throughout the ages. From these beaches millions of dollars' worth of gold have already been mined, and upon all of them the miners are working today.



This is how you land at Nome

The street scenes of Nome are interesting. The characters are those of the frontier gold-mining region of the icy north, mixed with the Eskimo life of Siberia and Alaska. There are many women and men as well dressed as those of our cities, and there are others clad in the rough clothing necessary to hard labor in the far north. There are miners wearing shoes laced to their knees, or white or black rubber boots that reach to the waist. There are Eskimos in mukluks, and garments of skins. Their fat Mongolian features look out of fur hoods, the bristles of which are as long as a hat-pin. Some are clad in parkas of fur or cotton, with their feet in boots of sealskin that reach to the knees. There are little Eskimo children that look more like furry balls than American children, until you observe their copper-colored faces and see their black eyes twinkling out of the fur hoods. There are Eskimo women with babies tied to their backs; the faces of the little ones look out over the shoulders of their mothers. There are Eskimo grown ups dressed half in fur and half in the rags of our civilization. The queerest Eskimo sights are when the rain comes, and this just now is most of the time. Then the Eskimos put on waterproof coats made of the bladders of the walrus, a skin which is as thin as paper, but which turns the rain and keeps one dry in the wettest of weather. This skin is in small pieces sewed together in bulbous patches. The coats are loose fitting, and they ha white hoods to cover the heads.

Among the most striking busine features of Nome are the curio shop stores selling mining materials, a those dealing in furs of every descri tion. I went through one hardwa store that does a business of sever hundred thousand dollars a year. T provision stores carry stocks which see out of proportion to the size of the co munity. This is especially so in t fall, for at that time full supplies ha to be laid in for the long winter montl The last steamer comes late in Octob From then on for six months or more t country is ice-bound, and such goods are brought in must be on dog-slec which have to travel a thousand mil or more to get here. Such supplies c as much in freight as the first price the goods.

The place is a wholesale cent It supplies the trade of the camps the Seward Peninsula, and also the of the Arctic coast of Alaska, a for much of northeastern Siberia well.

The traffic of Nome includes sorts of vehicles. You may automobiles on Front Street at eve hour of the day. Great wago hauling six tons of fish at a load drawn by heavy horses over t planks, and behind them may co little carts pulled by dogs. Looki down one of the side streets you m see the pup-mobile. This is a fitted to run on the railroad or on t board streets. The railroad of No was built for steam cars. It did pay, so the travel over it is now handcars, each drawn by from sev to fourteen dogs. Nome has a its carriages and buckboards, a you may often see a woman on hor back.

The residences of the city are odd as the business establishmen No one has built his home as a p manency. When Nome was fi started there was no lumber to had, and the first homes w tents. Later, frame houses were bu over the tents, or as an annex them. Many small shacks went and then came rambling buildings two or three stories. Even tod there are but few large houses a many a home has only three or fo rooms. One reason for this is the c of fuel and the difficulty of keepi the houses warm during the cold win months.

The sky line of the Nome streets as ragged as the jaws of a boy wh second teeth are just coming. T buildings are of an uneven height, t roofs of some rising high above those the others. This makes it necessa for the little buildings to have hi stovepipes, in order that their draug may not be cut off by the taller stru tures about them. The result is, a lit cottage will often have a galvaniz stovepipe as high as itself, rising abo it. Looking down on the town, o sees a thicket of these smoke-stac springing out of the roofs. They lo like handles to the houses below, a make one think of so many Irish sh lalahs, the pipes being the handles a the houses the knobs on the ends of t clubs.

Many of these houses have garde Nome has a short summer, but it is far north that the sun works from eig teen to twenty-four hours during t summer, and hence they are able grow lettuce, turnips and other gre stuff. Nearly every woman has so flowers in her front windows, and so have flowers growing outside. Ent ing, you find these homes very w furnished. They have their pianos a other musical instruments. They a well equipped with books and mag zines, and, in fact, with all the fu nishings of the cultured homes of t United States proper.

Among the buildings of note are t court-house, the post office and Ea Hall. There is also a large pub ool building and a commodious spital. The United States customuse and the United States road commssion have quarters of galvanized n, or rather tin shacks. The town is ecially proud of its fire department d life-saving station. These are in a le frame building on Front Street, e side of which faces the street, the er the ocean.

I like Nome. Its people are up and ing. There are but few drones ong them, and the most of them, to e a Western expression, are good osters. They have a hope for the ure of their city. They do not exct it to hold the population that it ce had, but they say that owing to e large area of low-grade gold earth out it Nome is bound to be an instrial mining center for generations come. They say also that its posin is such that it will always be the ief port of tho Seward Peninsula, a ritory which has vast mineral reurces yet to be developed. This may so, but the harbor leaves much to desired. The port is almost an en roadstead, and goods have to be nded in lighters, while passengers are ng high into the air on an aerial ble car, and thus brought to the ore.

I shall not forget my landing at ome. It was early in the morning en our steamer cast anchor, far out om the shore. We were taken from e ship by a steam launch to a landg, above which rose a great tower in e ocean far out from the shore. This wer is connected by a cable with other tower of an equal height on e mainland, and passengers are taken om the ocean tower to the land in a atform cage, which is raised by mainery to the cable and carried upon to the shore. The cage will hold rty or fifty passengers, and it skates, it were, through the air, high above e billows beneath. The baggage is ought the same way.

It is also difficult to go from the nding place to the steamer. The ats rise and fall with the waves, and embarking and disembarking are quite as dangerous as at Beira, South Africa, where one is let down in a basket, or at Jaffa, where he climbs down a rope ladder into small boats. In landing from the Victoria to the launch we used a ladder which was slung to the side of the ship. The motion was so great that tho women of the party had to be held by the sailors as they descended.

Such are the conditions when the sea is comparatively quiet. During a storm the passengers must wait outside, and in spring and fall the steamers have to make their way through the ice. As winter comes on, the ocean near the shore freezes over, and along about the first of November the harbor is ice-bound, and one can look for miles over a sea of ice. From then on for the next seven months the city is shut out from the rest of the world by ice and snow. The thermometer drops to below zero and stays there throughout the winter. Sometimes it goes to 40 degrees below, and, further back from the sea, still lower.

I am told by the residents that the Nome winter is the most interesting time of the year. Then the people have all sorts of entertainments. They have dances, socials, fairs and amateur theatricals. They engage in out-of-door sports, and especially in skiing. It is quite the thing to go from the town to the creeks and mining camps, across country on skis or long, sled-like, sharp-pointed runners, one of which is fastened to each foot in such a way that they can skate over the snow. Nome has a ski club, and tournaments are held, in which prizes are awarded both for jumping and for speed. Sleighing with dogs is another amusement. A common sight is milady, wrapped in furs, sitting in a dog-sled, with the driver running behind, holding on to the handle bars. Such sleds are used to go to dances held in the neighboring camps, and the men run races with each other, carrying their sweethearts in this way, while they and the dogs do their best to outdistance their fellows.

The First Christmas Circle and Ours

pworth League Topic. Matt. 2 : 9–11. Luke 2 : 15, 16, 20.

N countless homes and churches, in missions far and near, in comfortable rooms and in cold damp trenches the hristmas story is being told and porayed, and tonight the Babe of Bethleem is being adored in a world which ore than ever needs the message which e brought. The song of the angels rings ross a world in which real peace is a emory and in which good-will among en is fast changing to bitter hatred hich only long years can erase. Yet o Christmas story is not forgotten, for od and his truth are eternal, and uman contentions, even at their worst, re temporary and in time give place to etter understanding and good-will. he first Christmas circle included the abe, Mary, Joseph, the wise men, the ngels and tho shepherds. The wise en came to bring their treasures and worship. The angels came to bring lad tidings, and the shepherds, the ecipients of these tidings, came to prove hem and to go away glorifying and raising God. It was not a wide circle, et it has extended to include the world.

What is our Christmas circle? The abe of Bethlehem in a few short years ecame the Christ of Calvary. Reeemed by his sacrifice, from all the orld we gather to pay homage to his irth. Mothers, fathers, boys, girls, oung men, young women, ministers, issionaries, church workers of every egree, Orientals and Occidentals, resients of every zone and clime, we make goodly company as we kneel before he cradle of the Child Jesus. We orship. Wo sing glad hosannas. We lorify his name. We praise him. But an we bo sure that our worship is omplete? The worship of the wise men vas more than a bending knee and a owed head and a reverent heart. It vas expressed in the gift of their greatest reasure. Can we do less?

Helping to Accomplish the Purpose of Christ's Coming

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic (Christmas meeting). John 10 : 1–16

"I AM come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." "And there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

Christ came to declaro the love of God for a sin-cursed world, and to bring to this world salvation from sin through faith in him. The work of all who have entered through "the door" into the fold of the redeemed life is to bring others into that same happy life through that same door. There is but one Saviour and there is but one messago and there is but one way for the message to reach sinful men. Christianity, from tho beginning, has spread by contact.

Next in importance to the message of salvation through faith in Christ is the message of unity. We are to be one in him. The diversity of truth in its appeals to the minds of sincere men has led Christendom somewhat apart, and has weakened the power of the company of Christians to lead men to Christ. John R. Mott has said, "A disbelieving world is the price we pay for a divided church." No other living Christian has had a better opportunity to formulate a fair and accurate judgment. May it not bo that we can best accomplish the purpose of Christ's coming by laying aside the weights of our differences and by pressing forward as one force for Christ? Let the Congregationalist and the Presbyterian and the Baptist and the Methodist and the Disciple of Christ and every other representative of a divided church stand shoulder to shoulder with each of the others, and when all step forward together the disbelieving world will have no excuse for sin except the love of it.

Isaiah 9

Advent Messages: Isaiah's, Matthew's and Ours

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

Isaiah's Hope

THIS message of Isaiah was uttered in a time of war and dread. The north country of Judah was devastated by the military power of Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Samaria. Jerusalem trembled and prepared for the siege. Isaiah (chapter 7) counseled confidence. Who were Rezin and Pekah compared with God? "If ye will not believe how can ye rest secure?" But King Ahaz could not rise to the occasion—he chose the dangerous and tricky play of politics instead of a resolute and trustful defense. He called in alliance the great dominating despotism of Assyria to help him,—with fearful consequences for years to come. Galilee lay in darkness and despondency awaiting her impending fate. The dread Assyrians had come!

Such an explanation of the times of Isaiah helps us to see the primary meaning of his message to his contemporaries. For in such an hour he arose and prophesied of the coming of a greater than Ahaz, a Messianic King who should deliver Galilee, and bring them out of the shadow into light and joy. In the presence of a weak counselor who had increased war and sorrow Isaiah spoke of a God-sent leader who should be a Prince of Peace, a wonderful Counselor, an eternal Father and divine Hero to his people. With justice and righteousness the coming King would make permanent all that was noblest and best of the people of Israel and of the house of David. It was a message of hope.

Matthew's E perience

A THOROUGH Jew of Jews, Matthew the Evangelist writes his book, his Life and Teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, for one definite purpose,—namely, to show that in Jesus this agelong hope was fulfilled. The aspirations and needs of Israel had at last been spiritually met by an actual person! The Messiah had come! He had come even in Capernaum, in Zebulon and Naphtali, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet Isaiah. Galilee had heard him and had seen his wondrous works, as he called his disciples and "went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the good tidings of the Kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people." The common people heard him gladly. On the mount he gave his Beatitudes and the wondrous Program of the Kingdom. Men began to say, "Is not this the Christ?" For the promised glories of the Messianic era were being witnessed everywhere, the sick healed, the truth taught freely, the poor ministered unto.

Matthew himself had been a taxgatherer under the Roman exploiters, and was sitting at his booth "as Jesus passed by." The spell of the Son of Man came upon him, and the hidden hunger of his soul was satisfied. He arose and left all to follow Jesus. Then Matthew tells us how Jesus, having brought light and joy in Galilee, went on to Jerusalem. The loyal Galileans sang "Hosanna to the Son of David" and "all the city was stirred, saying, Who is this?" Matthew declared it was the realization of Isaiah's predictions, even of "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, behold, thy King cometh unto thee."

Rejected but Undismayed

BUT the priests and the rulers, blinder than Ahaz, would have none of him, and they persuaded the Jews and the Romans to work their will upon him. Yet though the song of the angels on Christmas Day was hushed in the darkness of the Great Rejection on Calvary, Matthew held that the Messiah had n failed, but had begun his kingdom in t souls of his followers. So he closes l narrative of vital experience with vision of the risen Christ, who sends l disciples out into all the earth to tea men to observe all things which commanded. Not for Israel alone, b for all nations. Not a limited and ter poral power at Jerusalem, but the ui

The Need of Light and Love

IF Christian America responds to t

the churches and by all his agencies men be nourished, but their souls will fed and builded up. Because new tr in God, new faith in the possibility brotherhood will be born. Love ma st by his disciples, light sent forth in s name, will preach most effectively e claims of the Son of God upon the oubled hearts of men.

With all the efforts of the Christian erald Family goes the message "In is Name." To the warring world the nerican Church registers its faith in e reign of the Prince of Peace, foretold Isaiah long ago, rejected by the fa-ored race who saw him, and rejected ain in our our own time by nations d rulers in blindness of hatred, or in eed of gain, or in mad unbrotherly ar. To our distressed neighbor repub- of Mexico we would also go in the irit of the Good Samaritan. The urch desires to supplement the great rbearance of our President and our ongress with the active ministry of issionaries of Light and Love, bearing e education and vital religion as hristmas gifts to Jesus Christ.

"Christmas, Christmas Everywhere"

THE message of Christmas was never more needed: "The sanctity of otherhood and the home above all tional vanity and worldly pomp and mmercial greed; the supremacy of the iritual values in the individual life; Peace on earth among men of good ill."

In large degree the spirit of Christmas s become established — in the home, in the local community, in child-caring and child-teaching agencies without number; even to a considerable extent in business. But internationally the Spirit of Christmas is not yet. Yet Jesus lived and suffered and rose again from the dead that the Spirit of Christmas might be universal. He dreamed and labored and taught that there might be universal love and honor, goodwill and peace, brotherhood among men and invincible confidence in God. Let us do something worthy of him, in response to the Call of the World, to show international goodwill, love to the alien and the turbulent and the oppressed of all nations, that in some true sense on Christmas Eve, 1916, Phillips Brooks's carol will be fulfilled—"Everywhere, everywhere, Christmas tonight."

Christmas, where children are hopeful and gay,
Christmas, where old men are patient and gray,
Christmas, where peace like a dove in its flight
Broods o'er brave men in the thick of the fight.
Everywhere, everywhere, Christmas tonight.

For the Christ Child who came is the Master of all:
No palace too great, no cottage too small:
The angels who welcome him sing from the height,
"In the city of David a King in his might."
Everywhere, everywhere, Christmas tonight.

One of these, "Christian itizenship for Girls," by Helen Thourn (40 cents), deals with a girl's relaonship to home, work, worship, recreaon, friends, etc. Another, on "Chrisanity and Amusements," by Richard . Edwards (50 cents), is a study of creation as one of life's master forces. he course on "Lives Worth Living," y Emily C. Peabody, deals with biographies of women of the Bible, folowed by modern biographies of corsponding types of women. For the ummer "Out of Doors in the Bible," by thel Cutler, will be good. "Questions r a Young Woman of Today," by hoda E. McCulloch, is a Biblical tudy bearing on life and its relationhips. Margaret G. Brooks has a ourse on "Message of the Earlier rophets to Israel" which gives forty imple lessons on Isaiah, Amos, Hosea nd Micah. Charlotte H. Adams has lso a course on "The Mind of the lessiah."

These books and courses, principally y women for women, should meet the ital needs of young women of today r the application of the Bible to life.

The Methodist Book Concern is lanning to bring out special courses of ssons dealing with life problems and he home. You should examine careully the graded lessons for the Seniors ssued by the International Sunday chool Lesson Committee.

How a Lady Superintendent Did It

Question. We are a country Sunday school. hey had Sunday school every two weeks r a few years, but for some cause it was bout dead. Last winter the average attendnce was not twenty. In January they lected new officers, and for some reason never could see why elected me superinendent. I had never held that office, and told hem I did not like to take it. There were any reasons for this, but there was no change nade, and for a few weeks I worried about it rom one meeting to the next, but I was etermined to do my best and bring the chool up to a working basis again

I first set to work by having a social at my ome, a log cabin of one big room. We cleared 28, and then proceeded to buy some Sunday chool supplies, furnishing every one with uarterlies. Some said, "They will forget to ring their quarterlies." I told them we would try it at any rate. In the quarterly was an advertisement of the "Little Cross and Crown" system of awarding pins for attendance. By the way, we were steadily gaining in attendance, reaching upward of thirty. I put this pin matter before them, and with one accord they voted to have them, and also voted to have Sunday school every Sunday, and in the morning, and you should see them come. We have an average attendance of fifty now and on Easter Sunday gave a really splendid program to an audience of 110. This was in our little country schoolhouse. You wonder what I am trying to get at in this, but if we can keep them together and steadily increasing in attendance we are bound to reach my desire, which is that every one may be led to God. The younger ones are not so hard to deal with, but there is a large number of girls and boys from fifteen to twenty years old who have drifted away. Some have come back. How can we get them all back and then keep them?

Very soon now we expect to have a preaching service at least once in two weeks. "Can you imagine a Sunday school running for several years and a very large percentage can't tell where to find the books of the Bible? Within the next two weeks I am going to see how many families I can get to subscribe to the Christian Herald. I think it will help in some homes. We have nearly every child from four to fifteen years in the community coming every Sunday, but I want these young men and women, too.

Answer. May we answer this earnest worker that the very best way to get in those young men and women is to form those you have into an organized class, even if there are but a few, with officers and a class name and motto, and a monthly week-night meeting. Then send them out for new members, and, as they come in, form Membership, Social and Spiritual Committees out of the class, and give them some neighborhood or missionary work to do. Your State Sunday School Association or the International Sunday School Association, 1416 Mallers Building, Chicago, will send you leaflets on how to organizo the class and "Weekday Activities." Secure samples of organized class pins from D. C. Cook Publishing Company, Elgin, Illinois. I am sure you will get all these young people back by this plan.

FIFTY-TWO years as a Sunday school teacher was the record of Professor J. Harry Deems, of the First Baptist Church of Baltimore on Sunday, September 17, 1916. Professor Deems began in 1864 with a class of boys, many of whom are now leaders in the life of the church. He now teaches an adult class of women

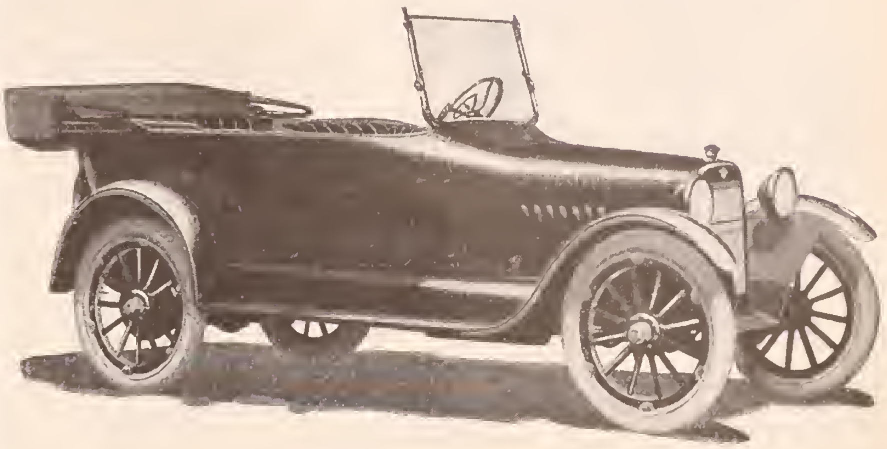
SAXON "SIX"



Consider the Many Ways
Saxon "Six" Excels

It is not in one way alone that Saxon "Six" surpasses other cars in its price-class.

In every phase of performance you'll find it matchless.

In pulling power on hills and in heavy going, in high-gear work, and in acceleration it is fully as able-acting a car as those of costly price.

At 1½ miles per hour "on high" it pulls smoothly and noiselessly. Mind you, that is a slower pace than a walking gait. Yet there's no "bucking" or "jerking."

At racing speed it grips the road closely, rides evenly, there's no side-sway. You feel safe and secure—and you are.

Then there's a further advantage to this frictionless power-flow. It lengthens motor-life greatly.

As nearly as can be estimated, Saxon "Six" maintains its full efficiency 20% longer than any other car of similar price.

Saxon "Six" is $815 f. o. b. Detroit.

"...the nerves can actually take hold of it!"

Dr. C. W. Saleeby, the widely quoted authority on eugenics, physiology, etc.

YOUR doctor will tell you this: Broken-down nerve tissues require not a stimulant but a builder, like organic phosphorus. To get this essential food actually to the nerves—that has been the problem. And now the well-known medical authority, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, of London, says:

> "Sanatogen is a specially adapted food that has solved the problem of giving phosphorus in such a way that the nervous system can actually take hold of it."

That is one feature of Sanatogen; the other and equally important mission is to build up blood and tissue with albumen or protein. As Prof. C. von Noorden, of Vienna, another international authority, says:

> "Sanatogen is an excellent albuminous preparation of especial value in anaemia and general debility."

Strengthening the nerves, building up the starved cells—that is Sanatogen's mission, splendidly fulfilled during eighteen years' successful use in every civilized land, as the written testimony of over 21,000 physicians convincingly proves.

You who are nervous, run-down or anaemic, cannot afford to ignore the help that Sanatogen offers.

My Happiest Christmas

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

JUST out of curiosity—pure unadulterated curiosity—I asked six friends of mine how each had spent his happiest Christmas. And the six answers were so utterly different that it occurred to me that you might be interested in them. The six friends were very different people, too—a mother of seven children, a college boy, a society girl, a business girl, a social service worker, and an old soldier.

THE mother of seven children was darning stockings—little stockings with truly awful holes in them—when I called on her.

"How did I spend my happiest Christmas?" she answered my question. "Goodness, honey, I don't think I've ever spent a Christmas that wasn't happy—and yet—" she smiled.

"The first year that I was married," she told me, "John—my husband—and I went in for very fussy gifts. I embroidered him a Turkish house coat and slippers (no, dear, of course he never wore them!), and he gave me a diamond pendant that was far too fine to match anything that I'll ever own. And we had a lovely dinner, and holly wreaths in all the windows, but—well, somehow something was missing.

"And then a year went by, and the day before our second Christmas Sonny was born. And when Christmas morning came I hardly realized, at first, that it was Christmas. We'd been too busy to bother with gifts, and there wasn't a holly wreath in the house. But suddenly, as I glanced down at Sonny's little head resting on my shoulder, it swept over me that it was Christmas—and what Christmas meant.

"And when John came in and looked at Sonny with a scared, proud look on his face, I knew that our Christmas gift was the only one that had ever really mattered. . . .

"And that was my happiest Christmas!"

THE college boy was tipped back in my biggest, softest chair as I asked him the question.

"Do you really," he half stammered, "want to know about my very happiest Christmas?"

"I do!" I answered.

The college boy smiled faintly, self-consciously.

"I think you'll understand," he said at last, "but somehow a feller's always afraid of being laughed at.

"It was my first year in college and Christmas eve was a big night with the students. Lots of noise and fun—harmless fun, mostly. But, somehow, I got mixed up in a little—fun—that wasn't harmless. I remember drinking some stuff out of a bottle, and then the next thing I remember was waking up in bed, at home, with an awful headache. I don't remember how I got there. And—it was Christmas morning.

"It wasn't long before my mother came into the room with my Christmas gift—my first gold watch—in her hand. And I knew from her face that she'd seen me the night before.

"'Mother,' I said, 'what can I give you for Christmas?'

"She looked at me. And then she turned and gazed out of the window.

"'Boy,' she said, 'I guess you know what it is that I want most of all!'

"And so I gave her a promise for a Christmas present. And I've kept it. And—that was my happiest Christmas."

THE society girl had slowed down her car and picked me out of the crowd of pedestrians. She was driving, herself, and the cold air had made her cheeks all aglow.

"I'm Christmas shopping!" she told me.

"Christmas?" I echoed. And then I asked her. "What was your happiest Christmas?"

"My happiest Christmas," the society girl told me, "was last year. I had just 'come out,' and on Christmas we gave a great house party at our country place. It was an old-fashioned party, and we had mistletoe hung up in the living-room. And," the society girl laughed softly, "Ted saw me as I stepped under it, and we were all alone in the room, and he kissed me. It was then that I first knew he—cared.

"Of course," the society girl hurried on, "that was my best Christmas, because it was the first Christmas that I could really entertain. And my gifts were lovely, and my party was such a success—" But I could see a bulge under her driving glove, on the third finger of her left hand. And I knew why it had been her happiest Christmas.

THE business girl is one of the smallest parts of a great concern. Day by day she does her work—a tiny wheel in a great machine. And sometimes, so she phrases it, "the monotony gets" her.

"I was tired that Christmas," she told me. "You see, it was the first Christmas I'd been working, and the first Christmas"—she choked—"that I hadn't had a home. You know how suddenly daddy and mother—left us? The idea of a Christmas without them simply floored me.

"I roomed alone in a big dingy house. And on Christmas eve, as I tramped up the long stairs, I bumped into a girl who was coming down. Her nose was pink. She'd been crying.

"Somehow I forgot to be conventional. 'You're lonely, too!' I said.

"'I am!' answered the girl.

"Well, she came up to my room and we talked things over. And the upshot of the matter was that on Christmas Day we had gathered all the lonely girls in the house together. And we went out and had a perfectly corking Christmas dinner at a big glittery hotel. It was," said the business girl, "one of my happiest Christmases. I often wonder why other lonely girls don't try it!"

THE social service worker chuckled at me and looked, with a humorous twinkle, around her crowded little room.

"I'm so busy each Christmas," she said, "that every one's the happiest. After all, if you're busy you're bound to be happy.

"On Christmas I always get up early and go visiting. I go into the slums and invite the poor kiddies to our Christmas tree in the afternoon. And most of them hang on to my skirts and say,

"'What's Christmas, teacher?'

"And then, on Christmas afternoon, after they've seen the tree and had their gifts, I gather them together—the little ones who didn't know the meaning of our Saviour's birthday. And I tell them about the Baby in the manger and the gift that he brought to us. And they go away, perfectly spellbound with the wonder of the story.

"That's why every Christmas is a happy one to me. For I help make little aliens little citizens—not only of our United States but of God's country. 'I love to tell the Story!' That's why every Christmas is a happy one to me!"

THE old soldier was talking to a quite large audience when I heard him.

"My happiest Christmas," he said, "was spent on the battlefield.

"We had had a hard day and little to eat, and we were tired. Up to sundown we didn't remember what day it was. And then, just as the campfires were being lighted, one of the boys yelled: 'Hey, fellers, know what day it is?' And then, all at once, we did remember.

"The other camp was not very far from us, and while we were on picket duty we had got to be sorter friendly—the sentries for the other side and us! Somebody'd often yell out, 'Hello, Yank!' and somebody else'd say, 'H'lo, there, Reb!' and then there'd be a laugh.

"It was Christmas Eve and the fellers in the other camp were lighting their fires, too. And then, somewhere in the darkness, someone—a boy, I guess, started to sing—

"'Silent Night, Holy Night—
All is calm, all is bright—'

Good Will Toward Men

Her visitor bridled a bit.

'I guess you didn't know Fred real ll, or you'd know, you'd know, he uldn't take directions from a woman. was a manly man. And I loved him, ," she ended, with a companion .

She looked such a weak creature that iss Wick felt almost ashamed to hate r. She took up the pink cretonne bag d turned down a hem with shaking gers. She had on three rather nice gs, which had come down in the mily. She only wore them in the ernoons when her work was done. e watch-chain about her neck had en her mother's. It had the substanl look of jewelry purchased in the ys when gold was at a premium. It ttered as it hung about her neck. And e had a gold thimble, too, which had ne duty for three generations. Miss ick withdrew herself behind that pressive glitter and in one moment ssed from a sorrowing woman into a iet, observant hostess.

"Won't you take a more comfortable air, Mrs. Fisher?" she asked, politely.

She had said Statira in the time of her rprise and emotion; but now the bars re up again. The visitor was not mindful of the change.

"I'm quite well here," she returned, ntly.

"Are you living in this neighborod?" Miss Wick inquired, with an crease of gentility.

"Yes. At the James place. I thought I came back where I was known I ight get sewing to do. I thought some my old friends might remember."

"There's been a lot of changes," Miss amilla said, bruskly. "All your lks are dead and all his folks are dead. nd we've got a good, competent dressaker here already. I don't believe ybody will want to change."

The widow's head drooped.

"I hoped to get work," she faltered. And then there was the house to live . So I came back with my little girls settle down."

The cretonne bag slipped a little in liss Camilla's hand.

"Have you children?" she inquired.

"Three little girls. We lost our boys. llie, the baby, is four. And Marion is x. And——"

She hesitated a trifle. She seemed to e trying to steady her voice.

"And Camilla is eleven," she finished.

"Camilla!"

"Her father wanted her called that. e fancied the name."

Oh, the days of long ago! Oh, the ictures of the past! Miss Camilla ut a trembling hand up to her face.

"Was that one of your girls I saw shoveling snow off the shed roof this morning?" Benedict asked.

"Yes," Mrs. Fisher replied. She turned a little sideways so as to include him in the conversation. "That was Camilla. We came right into that cold house in the depth of winter. I had a little coal sent out from the station and we found some wood in the shed. The snow was leaking in one corner of the roof, so Camilla cleaned it off for fear it would wet the wood. She's a great hand to do things."

She retied her bonnet strings and buttoned her coat at the neck. "I guess I must be going," she said. "I left them alone."

Miss Camilla laid down her bag and rose up. She did not shake hands, but bowed in a very ceremonious, polite fashion.

"I hope you won't get cold coming out in the snow," she said. "Put your comforter on. Benedict, before you open the door. Good-night. I hope you won't take cold," she insisted, politely.

She was still standing where he left her when Benedict came back. She was gazing in front of her in an absent sort of way. Her lips twitched. In a moment, however, she sat down again and began to fold up the bag. She laid it in a fine white handkerchief and stuck her threaded needle in the top.

"I feel sorry for that little woman," Benedict said. "She can't make a living on the James place. The soil's too poor. And I don't believe there's much of an opening for a dressmaker. How's she ever going to get on?"

He looked at his sister for an answer, but none came.

"What's that bag for?" he asked, irrelevantly.

"It's a Christmas present for Mrs. Judge Homer," his sister replied. "It's just two weeks to Christmas now."

"Why, so it is!" he rejoined, with surprise.

Nothing more was said until they went to bed, and then Benedict paused in the upper hall to kiss his sister with an unwonted show of affection.

"Good-night, old girl," he said. "Seeing as it's so near Christmas and all, don't you think you might find some work for Mrs. Fisher to do?"

His sister did not answer, but after she had reached her own room she stood at the window for a long while looking vindictively in the direction of the James farm.

"That woman ruined my life," she said to herself.

A LETTER TO EVERY SANTA CLAUS

The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.
Office of the Secretary.

To our friends, one and all:

WILL you let us help you with your Christmas giving? Here are twelve tests of a good Christmas gift. They will prove of very real value if you will use them, and while we suggest the Christian Herald as one gift that will stand the tests, this interesting table is for general application.

Good magazines are coming to be used more and more as Christmas gifts, and rightly so. Every year numbers of our readers give the Christian Herald to friends and relatives, and consider that there is no more easily selected or conveniently sent or satisfactory Christmas gift possible. In fact, two gifts are provided in subscribing for the Christian Herald for a friend, as we will presently explain.

But this year there are special reasons why the Christian Herald is an ideal Christmas gift. It is a time when extravagance in Christmas giving is out of place, because of world-wide hardship caused by the war. It is a time when Christmas gifts might well reflect as never before the Christ whose birthday we celebrate. It is a time when men's minds are peculiarly susceptible to the real Christmas message of peace, good will among men. It is a time when Christmas giving should spread cheerfulness and hope and happiness in large measure.

Among the gifts that fit into this situation is certainly the Christian Herald. Please let us remind you briefly what you give to your friend, your nephew's family, your boy away at school, your mother, your business associate, anyone when you give the Christian Herald as a Christmas remembrance:

You give for a year a weekly summary of the important news of the whole world, including the events of the war.

You give fifty-two sermons by America's leading preachers.

You give the splendid, profusely illustrated Maynard Owen Williams articles from the Orient, where he is traveling as our own representative in search of new things to tell.

You give a scholarly treatment of each week's Sunday school lesson; Helps on the Young People's topics; the stimulating experiences of the Prayer League, now many thousands strong.

You give that unique page, The Bible and Newspaper; Daily Meditations written especially for the Christian Herald by the most helpful and spiritual of modern ministers; the ever different and always interesting Mail Bag page.

You give Margaret E. Sangster's inimitable articles and poems.

You give a wealth of fiction and poetry, and very many special articles on important subjects.

You give a liberal selection weekly of good pictures, and fifty-two art covers that are the delight of all our readers.

You give besides all this much other timely matter on a wide variety of subjects; and while the whole atmosphere of the Christian Herald is newsy, cheerful, invigorating, its steady influence is for Christian living in every walk of life.

So in the Christian Herald you give a hundred up-to-the-minute books on travel, poetry, fiction, current history, Bible study, religious thought, art, prayer; books that arrive weekly, available, attractive, convenient, sure to be read.

If then a selection must be made of one gift only for this or that friend, why not the Christian Herald?

Before going on to the twelve tests, allow us to state another reason why the Christian Herald may well be included by you among your Christmas gifts this year.

How to Tell a Good Christmas Gift

THESE tests are always safe, but especially should Christmas gifts in this year of war sorrows be free from frippery, mere temporary worth, the solely worldly or material value. This is the first test—Genuineness.

The second: A Christmas gift should be in keeping with one's purse.—Unostentation.
A Christmas gift should display good taste.—Carefulness.
A Christmas gift should confer a real benefit.—Thoughtfulness.
A Christmas gift should produce unfeigned pleasure.—Interest.
A Christmas gift should be something you would wish associated with thoughts of yourself.—Friendship.
A Christmas gift should, if possible, be something that can be shared with others.—Kindliness.
A Christmas gift should, as long as it lasts, give as much delight as on Christmas morning.—Quality.
A Christmas gift should be something you yourself would be glad to possess.—Sincerity.
A Christmas gift should be something you have selected, not something picked up by chance.—Heartiness.
A Christmas gift should be something you take pleasure in thinking of afterward as having been given by you to your friend.—Satisfaction.

Chiefest, the Christmas gift (from a Christian) should suggest Christ. This is the final test. The real Christmas gift should make for peace and good will among men. This it does to some extent through such qualities as the above. The personal message with the gift can accomplish much. But best of all, let the gift itself do it.

WHICH one of these requirements in the ideal Christmas gift does the Christian Herald at two dollars a year, arriving every week, packed with good things, chiefly pertaining to the Kingdom, fail to meet? Please test each point with the Christian Herald in mind as a possible gift to any one on your Christmas list.

We believe you are interested in the continued success of the Christian Hera Perhaps you have wished you could get this or that person to subscribe, both a benefit to him and a help to us. You know from what we have said in the paper late that we greatly need to increase our subscribers. You intend to spend t dollars on some one, probably as much as that on several. Can you do better w the same amount of money than to subscribe for the Christian Herald for yo friends? Whereas for us you would be adding one, or two or more, to our list subscribers. Here is a very practical and beautiful way in which you can sh your interest in the Christian Herald.

To the twelve tests will you let us add another especially designed in our o interests? The ideal Christmas gift might well be something in the purchasing of wh someone is helped.

In urging the Christian Herald upon yo consideration as a Christmas gift, we are s cerely trying to help you solve some of yo Christmas problems in a satisfactory way. B we are also, of course, desirous of your help meeting the emergency which concerns us in t increasing cost of manufacture, and as a frie you can do us a no more kindly courtesy th to use the Christian Herald as a Christmas g this year, and without expending one dollar t you did not plan to spend in some form Christmas giving.

We stated that in giving a subscription the Christian Herald as a Christmas prese two gifts become possible. You are practica in the position of sending us a new subscripti and are therefore entitled to the special off on the following page, provided your su scription is for someone not now a subscrib Any one of the splendid selection of boo which are thus available to you will make itself an excellent Christmas gift. So for t dollars you can give the Christian Herald a all that that means as one Christmas gift, a one of these very desirable books or magazin as another. Or of course you can have t extra magazine or the book sent to yourself.

And note further that to each person f whom you subscribe to the Christian Herald a Christmas gift, we will send a most beau fully printed message from Rev. J. H. Jowet a card in black and red and gold design, fo inches by five and a half when folded, beari a printed announcement of the gift of t Christian Herald from yourself, your nan written in—a Christmas remembrance in itse One of the pleasantest things about the gift of a good magazine for Christmas that upon the receipt of the announcement that it is coming for a whole yea pleasurable anticipation and warm gratitude are at once awakened. It is a ve delightful experience to find one's self placed for a year upon the mailing list such a magazine as the Christian Herald as a gift.

And more: If your gift subscriptions reach us before December 18 we w send in addition to the Christian Herald for 1917 the present Christmas numb (December 20) which will have four pages of wonderful Japanese pictures heavy paper, two of the pages being printed in three colors; and also the Ne Year's number, December 27.

The magazine club offers on the page following this also can be use with satisfaction in Christmas giving, in connection with the Christian Heral Do not overlook them. Below you will find an order blank for yo convenience. It will cost you scarcely a moment and no trouble at all select and send the Christian Herald as a gift and indicate where book "club" magazine is to be sent.

The Christian Herald wishes you a merry Christmas and a happy New Yea

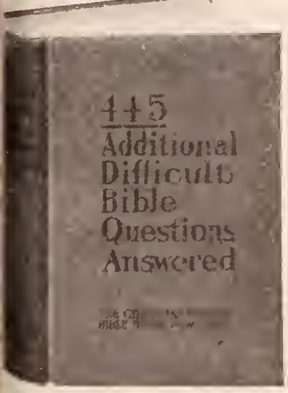
45 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES



WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

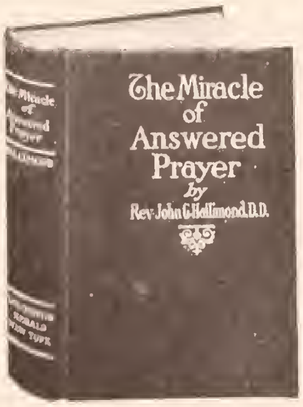
We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

HE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D.D.

A Book With a Message for Every Soul



The Miracle of Answered Prayer by Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D.

HINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is e story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a ecital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the hristian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a ook that no one can read without becoming convinced of its uth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father ward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

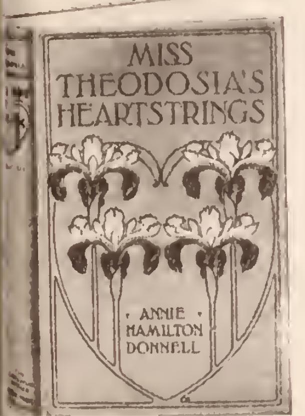
"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands f every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish bsolute evidence of the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's omise to his followers: "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the ather in my name He will give it you." "Ask, and it shall e given you. . . ."

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but appening in our own time—now—of answered prayers, all of hich are presented in the name of Jesus, and submitted to the ivine Will. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human xperience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

HEODOSIA'S HEARTSTRINGS



IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. What she found was a very much surprised child who was holding a baby on the small area of her knees. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest of the Flagg children, and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style. The thousands who have read her story about a little girl named Rebecca Mary, in the popular book bearing that title, will be all the more ready to love the irrepressible Evangeline, the ambitious Stefena, and the diminutive Elly Precious.

"Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings" is a book that no one who loves children can resist; the little Flaggs are a constant delight.

We will send a copy of "Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the lad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the ossibility of happiness should be held up to people, but he does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets er characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular ppeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. veryone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside book. It is safe to say that every single reader will egard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound n cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

Stop Eating Foods That Poison!

Why Wrong Eating is Responsible for More Sickness than Any Other Cause. How Right Eating Removes the Cause of Sickness.

By Arthur True Buswell, M. D.

Eugene Christian

Not long ago I had a talk with Eugene Christian, the noted food scientist, and he told me of some of his experiences in the treatment of disease through food. Incidentally Eugene Christian has personally treated over 23,000 people for almost every non-organic ailment known with almost unvaried success. An enviable record when one considers that people nearly always go to him after every other known method has failed.

One case which interested me greatly was that of a young business man whose efficiency had been practically wrecked through stomach acidity, fermentation and constipation, resulting in physical sluggishness which was naturally reflected in his ability to use his mind. He was twenty pounds underweight when he first went to see Christian and was so nervous he couldn't sleep. Stomach and intestinal gases were so severe that they caused irregular heart action and often fits of great mental depression. As Christian describes it he was not 50 per cent. efficient either mentally or physically. Yet in a few days, by following Christian's suggestions as to food, his constipation had completely gone, although he had formerly been in the habit of taking large daily doses of a strong cathartic. In five weeks every abnormal symptom had disappeared—his weight having increased 6 lbs. In addition to this he acquired a store of physical and mental energy so great in comparison with his former self as to almost belie the fact that it was the same man.

Another instance of what proper food combinations can do was that of a man one hundred pounds overweight whose only other discomfort was rheumatism. This man's greatest pleasure in life was eating. Though convinced of the necessity, he hesitated for months to go under treatment, believing he would be deprived of the pleasures of the table. He finally, however, decided to try it out. Not only did he begin losing weight at once, quickly regaining his normal figure, all signs of rheumatism disappearing, but he found the new diet far more delicious to the taste and afforded a much keener quality of enjoyment than his old method of eating and wrote Christian a letter to that effect.

But perhaps the most interesting case that Christian told me of was that of a multi-millionaire—a man 70 years old who had been traveling with his doctor for several years in a search for health. He was extremely emaciated, had chronic constipation, lumbago and rheumatism. For over twenty years he had suffered with stomach and intestinal trouble which in reality was superaciduous secretions in the stomach. The first menus given him were designed to remove the causes of acidity, which was accomplished in about thirty days. And after this was done he seemed to undergo a complete rejuvenation. His eyesight, hearing, taste and all of his mental faculties became keener and more alert. He had had no organic trouble—but he was starving to death from malnutrition and decomposition—all caused by the wrong selection and combination of foods. After six months' treatment this man was as well and strong as he had ever been in his life.

These instances of the efficacy of right eating I have simply chosen at random from perhaps a dozen Eugene Christian told me of, every one of which was fully as interesting and they applied to as many different ailments. Surely this man Christian is doing a great work.

I know of several instances where rich men and women have been so pleased with what he has done for them that they have sent him checks for $500 or $1000 in addition to the amount of the bill when paying him.

Food is the fuel of the human system, yet some of the combinations of food we put into our systems are as dangerous as dynamite, soggy wood and a little coal would be in a furnace—and just about as effective. Is it any wonder that the average life of man to-day is but 39 years—and that diseases of the stomach, liver and kidneys have increased 103 per cent. during the past few years!

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a little course of lessons which tells you exactly what to eat for health, strength and efficiency. This course is published by The Corrective Eating Society of New York.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons.

Reasons are given for every recommendation based upon actual results secured in the author's many years of practice, although technical terms have been avoided. Every point is explained so clearly that there can be no possible misunderstanding.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist because every possible point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

If you would like to examine these 24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, simply write The Corrective Eating Society, Department 3412, 460 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask them to send the lessons on five days' trial with the understanding that you will either return them within that time or remit $3.00, the small fee asked.

Please clip out and mail the following form instead of writing a letter, as this is a copy of the official blank adopted by the Society and will be honored at once.

CORRECTIVE EATING SOCIETY, Dept. 3412, 460 Fourth Ave., New York City

You may send me prepaid a copy of Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons. I will either remail them to you within five days after receipt or send you $3.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

It is related of Charles Kingsley that at one time when all England was praying for release from a long-continued season of unusually heavy rain, when crops were rotting in the fields and farmers and tradesmen were desperate, he refused to join his petition with the others. "How do I know," he is reported to have said, "that this weather is not in accordance with His will, and how can I be sure that the cholera might not come upon us if, in answer to our prayers, God should take away the rain?"

Sometimes we forget that our petitions must be in accordance with His will, and often we fail to consider the possible effect upon others of an affirmative answer to our prayers. We read the verses of Scripture in which we are promised those things for which we pray in faith believing, and we forget those which show that most earnest prayer may be amiss. God always answers prayer. Sometimes he answers "yes," sometimes "no"; and sometimes the answer is "wait." For nineteen centuries we have been praying "Thy kingdom come," and yet it waits his will. Paul prayed earnestly, thrice he prayed, that he might be relieved of a thorn in the flesh, a weakness that greatly troubled him. God answered "no," but he gave grace by which Paul rose superior to every weakness.

After all, Grace is the greatest answer to our prayer. We members of the Prayer League—there were 12,952 registered members on November 25—as we approach the throne of Grace each noontide, will not be satisfied with the mere remembrance of the petitions that we bring, but will wait for the fellowship of love, for the strengthening of Grace, for the touch of the divine which will glorify our daily life and which will give us strength to bear the burdens and to face the problems from which, perchance, we have prayed to be delivered.

Mrs. R. S. R. writes that though she knows she is saved she cannot forget the sins which Christ has purged away. The remembrance of the wrong she has done tortures her and she asks the League to pray that she may be able to forget and to trust God and to love him more. Also that she might have her eyes opened to many things she might do to help some one else. The very form of her request indicates that the spirit is leading her to the answer to her prayer. Loving service for others will crowd the heart and mind so full of joy in Christ that there will be no room for vain broodings or the remembrance of sins that are forgiven. In the twelfth verse of the eighth of Hebrews there is this quotation from Jeremiah: "For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." When we sin we injure both ourselves and God, but when God for Christ's sake has forgiven our sins and when he has expressly promised to remember them no more, we should pray for faith and grace to take him at his word. We should not let the memory of canceled sin stand between us and Christian living or Christian service. The members of the League will join with R. S. R. in prayer that she may be led out of her fears into paths of service in his name.

A. W. H. asks special prayer for two greatly afflicted friends, one of them suffering with cancer. He also asks prayer for the one hundred members of the class of which he is class-leader. He says, "I have bowed with you every day in prayer at the noon hour and I enjoy it."

W. H. F. writes a happy letter praising God for the recent triumph of prohibition. In the voting dry of five more states and possibly six there was an answer to thousands of prayers; but the battle for sobriety is but half w and W. H. F. asks the League to p and work for the complete abolitio the terrible traffic in alcoholic liq at home and abroad. He asks League to pray for the passage of bill now pending in Congress which prohibit the shipment of liquor Africa and other mission fields, and urges prayer throughout the sessio Congress that the representatives of people may pass righteous laws. In prayer we will all gladly join, and can do much to make our prayer eff ive by writing frequently to our rep sentatives and senators in the intere good cause represented in pending bill reece again attracted much atten- at the end of this week by the nimous refusal of the Greek govern- t to the demand of the Allies that arms and ammunition of the Greek tary establishment be surrendered. Tuesday the crown council was sum- ned, and after deliberation voted to port the government in its opposition he demands. Thousands of Greek are said to have gone to Larissa in north, where the bulk of the Greek y is, with the intention of resisting force any attempt of the Allies to e these arms. The Greek govern- t has delivered a protest to the neu- powers, including the United States, inst the "coercion" to which it is g subjected.

Except a few casual- these raiders appear to have accom- ned little.

he government of Venizelos at nica declared war on Bulgaria and many, which has been answered by tatement that the members of this e, not being part of the armed forces an established government, will not accorded the treatment of prisoners var if captured.

n the left wing of the Allies, on the nastir front, in the region of Mon- ir, there has been rather brisk fighting rly all the week, culminating in a tle of importance on a 17-mile line extending east and west just north of Monastir. According to the German accounts an assault on this whole front was made by the Allies, who, after several hours' fighting, were forced to fall back to their original position. The Allies in their accounts claim no important advances.

West of the river Varda, the British, after artillery preparation, made an attack on the German positions with infantry, which was not successful in gaining ground. This attack by the British at this point indicated that they had extended their line rather considerably to the west.

By withdrawing troops in large numbers for use in Europe, the Russians have seriously weakened their Caucasian front, a fact of which the Turks are taking advantage, particularly in the center of the region of Mush, where they have already driven the Muscovites back a considerable number of miles, on a fairly long front. Farther to the east, the Russians admit a Turkish advance to within ten miles of Van, which seems seriously threatened.

THE western front was, except for scattered artillery duels from time to time, very lifeless. On the Picardy front an occasional infantry attack occurred, such as a British attack on the German lines near Gueudecourt, or one by the French on the northern edge of St. Pierre Vaast wood, both of which failed. On this same front the Germans raided the British positions northeast of Beaumont, north of the Ancre River, and brought back 160 prisoners. South of the Somme the French attacked near Bouchavesnes, but accomplished little.

Remembering the Christian Herald's Famine Relief Work

RING the time he was war minister, the famine in the Sendai district caused great ering, and he speaks in highest terms of the t the Christian Herald took in the relief k. He cooperated with Mr. Deforest and hop Harris in every possible way, but says t the suffering would have been much ater had it not been for the timely assist- e of the American friends who responded erously to the appeal for help.

ollowing a few questions as to the extent my travels in Japan and Korea, and the ression of a high regard for the work of the ristian Herald, the new prime minister said: I have no particular statement to make at s time, but since there seems to have been rehension in some American circles as to course I shall follow, I am willing and xious to say that I have no desire to govern h the sword. One who expects that of me s not understand the tasks I have per- med, nor the spirit in which I performed m. I have many friends among the foreign ssionaries in Korea, prominent among whom Bishop Harris and Dr. Arnold of the glish Church mission, and they know the ture of my work there. Ever since I was a y there has been friendship between Japan d the United States, and it is my sincere sire to see this time-honored friendship last ever. In assuming the office of premier, shall labor to insure the permanent pros- rity of the land I serve, and friendship with nerica is an important factor in this desired ndition."

We spoke of the change in the Korean hools and the dropping of Bible study from e curriculum of mission schools.

"As a national measure," he explained, his change was necessary. It simply brings e mission schools in Korea under the same gulations which prevail in the Japanese gov- nment schools both for Japanese and oreans in Korea and in all schools in Japan. here is perfect freedom of religious belief, d not only tolerance but friendship for hristianity. The doing away with Bible udy in Korean mission schools is a national d educational measure and not a discrimina- on against Christianity. The fact that hristianity is still increasing its hold on the ople is shown by the increase in the number Bibles sold. Both Dr. Mott and Dr. Speer ve talked with me concerning the matter, d they agree that, under the circumstances, e move was necessary and just. The Chris- an missionaries in Japan understand our otive and the wisdom of our decision."

A Warm Advo ate of the "Open Door" in China

ASSURING Count Terauchi that in case he preferred not to answer, I would understand his position, I then asked about the probable action of Japan in Manchuria and her attitude toward the activities of the American International Corporation in railway and canal-digging enterprises in China.

"As for Manchuria," answered the premier, "Japan fought two wars in which she rightly earned whatever privileges she has there. No question of the Open Door—which Japan will seek in every way to maintain in China—is involved in the Japanese activities in Manchuria. Japan will make no attempt to infringe upon the Open Door policy, but her just rights in Manchuria will be protected and the present situation there continued.

"I know very little about the question of the digging of the Grand Canal, part of which traverses Shantung, in which Japan has won Germany's rights of development measures, but my impression is that that is an old question. The railroad is not for the benefit of China alone, but for the entire world, and Japan will reap benefit from this development. Of course there can be no objection to such action on the part of the United States."

Count Terauchi is a laconic speaker. His words, though few, are chosen with care. The words he uses most frequently are "the permanent peace of the Far East," and in his directness, power, attention to detail and invincible energy there lies great promise that this desire on his part will be realized under the new régime.

This big light car means satisfaction!

Satisfaction in pride of ownership—in driving performance—in low after-cost

Big but not heavy. High class but not high priced. A car with unlimited power and "pep." A car of constant satisfaction, because of modest upkeep cost.

On the road, the Haynes takes the dust of no car. Sixty miles per hour is at your disposal and it holds the road in making any speed.

"America's Greatest 'Light Six'"

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

On the toughest hills, the Haynes has the power to make the crest on "high." This high speed Haynes motor develops more power than any other engine with the same bore and stroke.

As for upkeep—light weight, perfect balance and accuracy of Haynes construction mean economy that makes many a lower priced car extravagant in comparison.

Study the graceful lines, the fine finish, the careful workmanship of the Haynes. Compare it not only with cars of a similar price but with those $500 to $1,000 higher—keeping in mind beauty, power, performance and upkeep—and you will buy a Haynes—the big light car that means the highest sense of pride and enjoyment and light upkeep.

The Haynes demountable top fits the body perfectly, gives all the luxury and comfort of a closed car, and when warm weather comes, is removed in a jiffy.

As God Has Prospered You

If piling up riches, accumulating for one's self the small possessions of the poor, filling barns with the first-fruits of the harvest and holding the produce for the highest prices—if such things constituted the essence of the Christian religion, the Christian Herald would try to devise ways and means for assisting readers in doing these things, and would lose no opportunity to point out where there were widows to rob and orphans to defraud.

But the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion is that it teaches giving to others. From the beginning to the end of Scripture, the inspired writers talk of blessed things which God has provided for those who love him, and the greatest of these is the giving spirit, for it is declared that it is more blessed to give than to receive.

One now and then must fortify his soul with this encouragement from on high, when from every side he is beset to give for the help of others. Probably never before has such a cry for help been wrung from the human race as that which for so many bitter months has been going up from Europe. That cry has assailed the ears of America without ceasing—and not in vain. It is cause for rejoicing that Christian Herald readers never grow weary of being urged to listen to such appeals and to give until it hurts to give.

Because of the present acute situation, and because of the varied needs that always exist, and also because it is indeed a Scriptural plan, we have devised the systematic Monthly Offering Club plan for the assistance of all of our readers who wish to make their giving as effective as possible and can look ahead with fair certainty of being able to give regularly to benevolent causes. We do not seek to imp this plan upon any one. There many most generous souls who pr to give when the occasion arises without a fixed plan. As a matte fact, that is the way that Christ Herald charities have been sustai in the past. We do not wish to down a new rule for those who give that manner. Every man must fully persuaded in his own heart b what to give and how to give.

On the other hand, there are a gr many who will be helped in their giv by this plan of Monthly Offering Cl and we invite all our readers to consi the plan carefully, and if so moved enlist in one or the other of these cl The idea is that members of the cl determine to give monthly a cert amount to one or more of the bene lences sustained by Christian He readers, and in sending in their mont gifts they will indicate how they w them divided. At present, of cou the greatest need for relief in the w is in Europe. But there are other ac needs at home. Our Bowery Miss work will need much support winter; there are missionary enterpr that must not be neglected; the Chi orphanage work is entitled to its share of consideration. We give be the exact standing of clubs November

The Christmas ship Cæsar, being loaded by the American C mittee for Armenian and Syrian Rel is expected to sail just about the t this number of the Christian He reaches our readers. Will there be a Victrola in your home this Christmas?

The only instrument that brings you the world's greatest artists

A splendid surprise for your family—to have Caruso, Destinn, Farrar, Gluck, Hempel, Homer, McCormack, Melba, Ruffo, Schumann-Heink, Scotti, Tetrazzini and other famous artists sing for them; to have Elman, Kreisler, Paderewski, Powell, Zimbalist and other noted instrumentalists play for them; to hear Sousa's Band, Pryor's Band, Conway's Band, Vessella's Band, Victor Herbert's Orchestra; to enjoy Harry Lauder, Nora Bayes, DeWolf Hopper, Raymond Hitchcock and other celebrated comedians and entertainers.

Nothing else will bring so much pleasure to your family and friends all the year round.

There are Victors and Victrolas in great variety of styles from $10 to $400, and there are Victor dealers in every city in the world who will gladly demonstrate them and play any music you wish to hear.

Important warning. Victor Records can be safely and satisfactorily played only with Victor Needles or Tungs-tone Stylus on Victors or Victrolas. Victor Records cannot be safely played on machines with jeweled or other reproducing points.

To insure Victor quality, always look for the famous trademark, "His Master's Voice." It is on every Victrola and every Victor Record. It is the identifying label on all genuine Victrolas and Victor Records.

Questions and Answers

READER, Ashland, Neb. 1. Please explain who sinned, Barnabas or Paul, in the scene described in Acts 15 : 39. 2. Did Peter sin in the separating from the Gentiles? (Gal. 2 : 11, 12).

1. It is difficult to answer your question without going fully into the history of Mark. His was a trained career, as you will remember. In Acts 13 : 13, we are told of his apparent backsliding and shrinking from a continuation of the work of the Lord, with its attendant hardship and toils. Then it must be remembered that he was the nephew of Barnabas, and that, Barnabas having sided with Paul in his dispute with Peter, there was a manifest coolness between the adherents of Barnabas and those of Paul. We must not allow ourselves to condemn either side. Peter and Paul and their respective followers were all engaged in the one great work. Either party had much to contend with, and each accomplished much, even though it followed ways other than those chosen by the other party. It cannot be said that either of them did more than err in his zeal. One of these noble men was too harsh, the other too forgiving; neither chose to yield, and so they failed. Peter sinned and so did Paul. Anyone sins who allows his temper to get the better of him, but in all his weakness, we cannot help but admire Peter, who was always ready to confess and to repent. Blame him as we might for his inconsistency in eating with the Gentiles and then forbidding others to do so, we cannot but praise him for the humility with which he bore the rebuke of his younger colleague, and graciously commended the Epistles of his brother Paul in which his own inconsistency is recorded (2 Pet. 3 : 15, 16).

A Subscriber, Minneapolis, Minn. Please explain (1) Matt. 3 : 9; (2) Isa. 40 : 8; (3) James 2 : 10.

1. John the Baptist is here disposing of one of the errors of the scribes and Pharisees. They used, as a defense from John's warnings of impending doom, the fact that they, being of Abraham's seed and hence having God as Father, were immune. But John tells them that they cannot use this argument, for God is able out of these stones lying loose on the banks of the Jordan to raise up children unto Abraham, to take the place of those heirs who reject John's teachings. 2. This is one of the Messianic chapters, and though much of it is purely allegorical, the general import is plain. The Lord Jehovah, who sends the withering east wind to burn and eat up a people who do not care for him, is the selfsame Jehovah whose Word shall stand forever, in which Word he tells his people that its iniquity has been expiated through Christ's atonement. Subsequent events have proved that the prophet was correct. The word of the Lord came true. 3. The truth of this statement is founded on sound principles. The same God who gave one commandment gave all; the law is but an expression of God's will, and therefore whosoever breaks one commandment opposes himself to God's will and hence is convicted under the law. The Pharisees had a theory that if a man kept one precept of the law it was sufficient, and thus some selected the law of the Sabbath, others that of sacrifice, and so forth. It is against this apparently wrong practice that the writer here warns the Jewish Christians by telling them that they must keep all the law, or, as its equivalent, believe in Him who has fulfilled all the law for them.

W. I. G., Johnstown, Pa. What are the functions of the Apostolic Delegate from the Vatican to the United States?

There are three kinds of Apostolic Delegates sent out by the Vatican. One "sent to those countries that have diplomatic relations with the Holy See (so-called) and such a one has appended the further title of Envoy Extraordinary. In this class are the delegates to Colombia, Peru, Bolivia, Costa Rica and other South American countries. The other kind of Apostolic Delegate is of a purely ecclesiastical character and is sent to missionary countries and deals with ecclesiastical matters only. Our local representative in Washington is of this class. He is here because, "by virtue of his apostolic prerogative, while providing for the care of all the lambs and all the sheep confided to him, the Roman Pontiff discharges his apostolic duty also by delegating ecclesiastics for a time or permanently to go to a place where he cannot go, and, taking his place, to exercise the jurisdiction as he himself, were he present, would exercise." The delegate in Washington acts as a court of appeals in disputes arising within the church, and has no official connection with our government, which also does not recognize him any more than it does the representative of any other religious body.

Mrs. F. D. R., St. John, Kans. Please explain I Pet. 3 : 19, 20, 21. The Mail-Bag is such a wonderful help and comfort to me.

We are glad that the Mail-Bag is helpful. That is as we intend it should be. The explanation of the passage relating to the "spirits in prison" is difficult. We treated of the passage in our "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," and accepted the view set forth by most authorities, that the antediluvians were meant. That Christ went to these during his three days in the tomb, not to preach the Gospel, for the time for that was past, but to announce his finished work. The passage, like so many others, is really unimportant for us, when we consider that all we want of the Bible is a "way of Salvation." Christ preaches to us daily in His word and our hearts and souls, and that ought to be enough for us.

WONDER GIFTS

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

IF Santa Claus brought wonder gifts
Hung on a wonder tree,
He'd bring a peck o' happiness,
An' give a bit to me.
He'd give some hope to little Jim,
Whose back is bent an' achin';
He'd bring good cheer to gran'ma dear,
Whose hands are worn an' shakin';
He'd bring back faith to Mrs. Brown,
Whose baby boy seems dyin';
An' he'd bring smiles to tired eyes,
That have been dim with cryin'.
He'd bring some love to Susan Jane,
Whose sweetheart died at sea,
If Santa Claus brought wonder gifts,
Hung on a wonder tree.

IF Santa Claus brought wonder gifts,
An' stuffed all stockin's tight,
There'd be one silver star—or two—
In every cloudy night.
An' rich folks wouldn't be too rich,
An' poor folks wouldn't cry
'Cause they were cold, an' hadn't gold,
An' were afraid they'd die.
All folks would have enough to eat,
An' lots to give away;
An' there'd be time to laugh an' sing,
An' time to kneel an' pray.
The world would be a pleasant place,
All pure, an' sweet, an' bright,
If Santa Claus brought wonder gifts,
An' filled all stockin's tight.

T. F., Reedsville, W. Va. There is no occasion to contrast the passage in Rom. 5 : 12, 13, 14 so as to read therein an allusion to pre-Adamites. According to the apostle's conviction, evil may have been in existence in another world—that of the angels, for instance—and entered into the world of man through Adam. But that is only problematic. Adam was the progenitor, not only of the Jewish, but of all the human race.

E. G. F., Washington, N. H. Theological authorities give various interpretations to the appellation "Antichrist," as it is found in Scripture. Some maintain that it means only a "false Christ"; others that it is applicable to any system of doctrine which vitally distorts, misrepresents or antagonizes the teachings of Christ; and still others that it is to be applied to any one who, wielding great power in worldly affairs, sets up a claim to spiritual power equal or even superior to that of Christ, and is therefore both his rival and antagonist. There are others who take the ground that it is a term properly applicable to any doctrine subversive of the Christian faith, and in a more direct sense it applies to any man or body of men who set themselves up against the spirit of Christianity. Bishop Hurd, a recognized authority, declared that "every person hostile to the authority of Jesus Christ as Lord or Head of the church and to the spirit of his religion is called Antichrist." John illustrated this view very clearly in 1 John 2 : 18 and 4 : 3, in which he referred to Jewish sectarians who were false teachers, corrupting the truth. Theological writers have discussed the subject very fully. They have taken Balaam as a type of Antichrist, also Antiochus Epiphanes, the "king of fierce countenance" (Dan. 8 : 23–25). In Matt. 24 : 5 Jesus himself foretold the appearance of false Messiahs. (See also verses 23, 24 and Mark 13 : 21, 22.) Paul's "man of sin" (II Thess. 2 : 3, 4) and the false teachers referred to in John's epistles—Cerinthus, Basilides, Simon Magus and the Gnostics, who denied Christ's Sonship—are in the same category. It is unquestionable that the early Christians "looked for Antichrist in a person, not in a polity or system." They held that he would be armed with Satanic power, and some even believed that he would be Satan himself. Joachim was the first to suggest that the Antichrist would be a universal pontiff. The Waldenses in the twelfth century, in a treatise on the subject, held Antichrist to be "the whole anti-Christian principle concealing itself under the guise of Christianity and having a system of falsehood adorning itself with a show of beauty and piety, yet very unsuitable to the church of Christ." This indicates the apostate church, which perverts truth to falsehood, exacts for its head the worship that belongs to God alone, and "robs the Saviour of his merits and the sufficiency of his grace in justification, regeneration, redemption and sanctification."

R. A. W., Poultney, Vt., writes, replying to A. M. L., Harrison, Mo., "How they conduct family worship" (October 25 number of the Christian Herald): "We have our little ones join in family worship as soon as they are three or four years old, with a little prayer of their own—for instance—'God bless papa and mama, and help me to be good,' then all join in the Lord's Prayer as the father closes his prayer. Once or twice each week let each member of the family offer a short, individual prayer. Also let each member of the family repeat a new Bible verse every morning. Keep a list of fifty or one hundred verses; rotate until all are committed."

J. S. A., Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "In the current number, just received, I was interested in the answer to the question about the 'field of blood,' mentioned in Acts 1 : 18, 19 and Matt. 27 : 6–8, asked by Constant Reader, Montana. As I had been enlightened by the presentation of the subject in appendix 161 of the Companion Bible, issued by the Oxford Press, I have taken the liberty to make a slightly condensed copy, which I enclose herewith. The Mail-Bag is always helpful, and I want to express my gratitude for the information and help there given.

There were two purchases recorded—one in Matt. 27 : 6–8, the other in Acts 1 : 18, 19. The first by the priests; the other, by Judas himself. The purchase by Judas was before that of the priests. There was no time between the betrayal and suicide to arrange property transfer. What the chief priests bought was 'a field' (Greek agros). What Judas bought was what in English we should call a 'place'—a farm or small property; both the Greek text and the Syriac preserve this difference. The verbs are different. In Matt. 27 : 7 it is agorazo, to buy in the open market. In Acts 1 : 18 it is ktaomai—to acquire possession. The place was bought with 'the reward of iniquity'—a Hebrew idiom used for stolen money. (See John 12 : 6.) The two had different names. That of the priests' was called agros haimatos—a field bought with the price of blood—meaning murder."

Mrs. H. H. B., Berkeley, Calif. We have referred your letter to an authority on the subject.

Mrs. Martha Faulkener, Five Islands, County Colchester, Nova Scotia, Canada, would be grateful to any one sending her the address of P. M. Newton, formerly of Randolph, Cattaraugus County, N. Y.

Mrs. C. B., Rockingham, N. C. Your relative in the state of Washington, whose Sunday school was forcibly closed by some fanatical sect, can doubtless obtain the protection to which she is entitled by applying to the proper authorities.

R. M., Chilson, N. Y. You are disturbed because, though you are a Christian and leading a Christian life, you still have evil thoughts. The best of Christians have had the same experience. Jesus was tempted, Peter fell, Paul's life was one continuous up-and-down between his thorn in the flesh and other temptations and harassments. Luther wrote that he had a severe battle with the devil every time he prepared to partake of the Lord's Supper. Do not be disturbed by the evil thoughts; fight them and they will leave you. The sin lies not in being tempted, but in yielding to and inviting temptation. Remember that most of us will not attain perfection here, but we must keep on running and striving until the end.

P. H., California. Although there are many who have knowledge of the exact date of their conversion there are as many who have not. The Holy Spirit works in various ways. To some he comes in an upheaval that cannot be mistaken; to others he comes like a balmy zephyr, hardly noticeable. You say you have believed since childhood and that today you fix your faith on John 3 : 16. Why then worry about your salvation? You believe on Christ; that is the only condition precedent to your salvation, according to this passage. The very fact that you doubt your repentance is proof that you have repented, for one that has passed his day of repentance does not care whether he has repented or not.

J. F. P., Montgomery, Ala. Please explain Dan. 12 : 13.

The prophet here is telling the believer of his fate. He is to wait patiently, like Israel, for the blessing until the fulfilment of God's good time. He did not receive the promise, but had to wait until the Christian elect should be brought in at the resurrection, when each shall receive his lot. The term "lot" is here used as an image taken from the allotment of the earthly Canaan. Whatever be the lot of the saints in their earthly pilgrimage, their lot at the end is to be supremely blessed.

D. O. B., Johnstown, Pa. No good purpose will be gained by a discussion as to Jesus' purpose in choosing Judas as an apostle, while he knew him to be wicked (John 6 : 70). Nor are we vitally concerned with knowing his purpose in keeping Judas among the apostles, though he was lost (John 17 : 12). It is sufficient for us to follow the narrative of the Gospel, which shows that, although Jesus knew that Judas would betray him, he allowed him to act as disciple in order that the divine plan foretold for ages might be fulfilled in every detail.

Mrs. G. H. W., Urbana, Ill. Other matters loom larger on the horizon at present, but the subject you mention is not forgotten. It is only overshadowed by more urgent topics.

The Proposal of Peace

NO profit can come in questioning Germany's motive in proposing peace. Peace itself is motive enough. The main point is that the proposal stands for the world to accept or reject. The way to peace is opened.

It is not for the combatants alone to deal with. It is a world war; it is to be a world peace; and it is all the world's business. The neutral peoples have rights, opportunities and obligations in regard to permanent peace. The neutrals are the controlling element in world power. It is for them to see to it that no inordinate ambition or unquenchable hate on the part of any nation or group of nations directly involved shall be permitted to stand in the way of peace.

This is no time for any of the nations in the war to stand upon pride or to speak in generalities. The original causes of the war, if ever understood by the neutrals or by the people of the nations involved, have long been obscured and forgotten. Neither the neutrals nor the peoples at war know why it should go on, if indeed even the extremists among the belligerents themselves know. It is all a horror in the dark. It is time for definite statement of demands and terms on all sides.

Three-fifths of the peoples of the world and three-fifths of its area are directly engaged in the war. Upon the neutral two-fifths devolves the necessity to exert whatever moral power it may possess to encourage negotiations, restore sanity and establish peace.

Naturally each nation at war may suggest terms and conditions to which the others may not at once assent. But such divergent demands are not a bar to, but the very basis for, fair negotiations. There can be no reasonable demands made in any quarter that may not be compromised. There appear no purposes or prospects in the war that may not be arbitrated.

Were the various demands of the contending nations ascertained and set up in line for calm examination and comparison, who can say but that they might be found reconcilable? At least such opportunity for sane study of the real issues would give the warring peoples something to think about besides aimless slaughter, and there always is hope in enlightened thinking.

A WORLD that has turned away from God, defying his fixed laws and scorning his love, to hate and kill and devastate, may no more justly or sanely accuse him of purpose in the dread results than may he who willfully thrusts his hand into a flame cry out that it is God's purpose that his hand be seared. God creates both good and evil—yes, as a glowing lamp creates both light and the shadow that lies in the path of him who turns his back upon the light. God's purpose in evil is not that it shall persist, but that its hatefulness shall turn us to him for wisdom and safety.

When will the world heed the lesson, if not now? Has there not been killing enough to teach us its horror? Has there not been devastation enough to teach us its futility? Has there not been hate enough to teach us its hatefulness? Must the world be further drenched in blood, still further shattered by the artillery of hell, and further yet degraded and debased by hate, to learn the simple lesson that His love means peace, and that his statutes are the only test of right?

THERE are two stages in war in which peace negotiation is possible. One is in the complete triumph of the one side over the other—a stage that in the present war appears infinitely remote; the other is in a "draw"—a stage that has existed in this war ever since the battle of the Aisne. Hundreds, thousands, millions are being slain, or maimed, widowed, orphaned and impoverished, and billions upon billions in property destroyed, with neither side gaining any appreciable advantage. There is no glory, no profit, no hopeful prospect in this stage of war, but only death, devastation and anguish.

The dreadful and indecisive results of the war up to this time, in which none of the nations involved has gained anything worth speaking of and all have suffered losses unspeakable, have caused all in their hearts to want peace. There can be no question of this. The German Chancellor, Von Bethmann-Hollweg, and the former British Premier, Asquith, no less clearly than official spokesmen of other nations in the war, have repeatedly expressed readiness for peace. Almost plaintive is the recent utterance of the German Chancellor: "Again and again we have declared our willingness to enter into negotiations of peace. Our expressions have never been responded to." German militarism even has been shaken to its base. Only the day before the peace proposal was offered, Field Marshal von Hindenburg, Chief of the German Staff, when asked if there was any prospect of the slaughter coming to an end, replied: "Ask the Entente. We are ready to discuss peace at any time, and have said so often enough."

There are in all the belligerent countries financial and political groups that would continue the war at any cost, but from the peoples of all come convincing evidences that the elements in favor of an early and honorable peace are in overwhelming majorities. The sudden retirement of Russian Premier Stürmer and German Foreign Minister von Jagow is now well understood to be due to their negotiations for peace between Germany and Russia, or perhaps, rather, to the failure of their negotiations. That a plan of agreement was far advanced cannot be doubted. Is it unreasonable to suspect that the tremendous official demonstration of war spirit just made in England in the reorganization of the ministry and in France in a similar reorganization, was a desperate move to stifle the growing peace spirit of their people? As the boy whistles to keep his courage up, so may statesmen bluster because they are in desperation.

THIS greatest republic in the world, as recognized leader of the neutral nations, is confronted by the gravest obligation ever put upon any nation in all history. It is the obligation to encourage, to promote, yes, if need be, to compel, peace. Munitions furnished by the neutrals are doing the larger part of the killing. Commissary supplies from the neutrals largely sustain the armies. Loans from the neutrals have furnished the "sinews of war." It is through the consent and cooperation of the neutrals that the war has continued on as large a scale for so long a time. Were all such financial and commercial assistance withdrawn, the war must soon die out of exhaustion of resources. So the neutral nations have power to compel peace; if all kindly offices fail, there is the last resort of commercial and financial compulsion.

We sincerely believe the time has come for the President, the Congress and the people of the United States not only to recognize our God-assigned duty toward the warring world, but also to realize our God-given power to perform it. A ringing cry for peace, coming from this nation at this time, would be heard and given heed throughout the warring world.

War is an unqualified horror, an unmitigated wrong, and the only good that can come out of it is peace. There is the far-flung argument that the machine-slaughter of innocent millions, through the ambitions and errors of rulers, is God's own plan for the expiation of wrongs and for the establishment of right. What sophistry! What blasphemy!

Through the stupidity or greed of a railway management, two trains crash together, and their precious freight of humanity is mangled or killed in hundreds. Shall the on-lookers stand back from rescue, calmly saying: "It is expiatory of wrong, and God's purpose must work its course"? No! No! All men impulsively rush to the rescue, to bind up the wounds in tenderness, to bury the dead in decency, to clear away the wreckage as well as may be; not stopping to argue ingeniously, but irresistibly impelled by the instinctive, soul-deep conviction that always God's purpose is that men shall help their brothers in disaster and distress, repair the ravages of force through kindness, and remedy wrongs through reason.

If there is good in disaster of any sort, that good lies in the spirit of sympathy and helpfulness it engenders in human hearts. Out of vile muck fair flowers may bloom; out of the lightning-rent rock sweet springs may flow; but out of war there can come no good thing but peace.

It is often said that this is to be the last great war. All the more reason, then that it be ended in the name of God and of the higher rights of mankind. Boundary lines, commercial advantages, financial prestige, kingly powers will be contested always, and offer no safe basis for any lasting peace. Peace, to be permanent, must come of higher motives and be fixed upon a higher plane.

Principles of right and justice were never determined by war. Strength of numbers, equipment and resources may be tested by war; trade supremacy may be won by war; domain may be extended and maintained by war; thrones may be seized and held by it such issues as these may be settled by force of skill, of energy, or of arms. But principles of right and justice are above and beyond the contending forces of battling nations, as the serene sunshine ever beams above and beyond the storm-clouds. War obscures these principles and blinds us to them. Only the calm of peace can let the clear sunshine through to us.

Let us awake from the hideous nightmare of "God's purpose in war" to the beautiful and abiding conviction of God's purpose in peace.

Let us seek to set above all political, commercial and financial considerations the sacred right of mankind to be at peace.

It is peace the world is to cry for, to strive for, to pray for.

Peace alone can bind up the wounds of war and set the world's wrongs right.

Why the President Should Act Now

ONE of the history-making documents of the war is the open letter of William Bayard Hale to President Wilson in which, in the name of humanity, he urges him to take immediate steps looking toward mediation. This remarkable letter, which appeared in the New York American of December 10, being cabled from The Hague, apprised Mr. Wilson of actual conditions and of the urgent desire for America to tender mediatorial offices. This was three full days before Chancellor Hollweg's address in the Reichstag, announcing that Germany had placed her peace proposals in the hands of the diplomatic representatives of the United States, Spain and Switzerland, for transmission to the Allied governments. So closely did the event follow the warning that the authorized statement from the Washington administration on December 12, repeating the old, worn-out assurance that the time for America to act was still indefinitely remote, seemed sadly out of place and ill-informed.

We quote below the essential passages of Mr. Hale's letter, which should be read everywhere.

> Mr. President
>
> In other days you have sometimes been pleased to use my eyes as your own. You have expressed confidence in the fidelity of my observation as a reporter
>
> Mr President, I wish I might tell you a little of what I have seen within the circuit of these smoking hills, from which for days I have watched the epic struggle which, since time began, has never been approached
>
> One knows that men die in battle, but to see them die, and in numbers like these, such deaths as these, and with such utter futility—if you were here, Mr President, you would find that hard.
>
> For men are dying here, Germans, Frenchmen, Englishmen, dying in holes in the ground, dying under the trees, dying in stables, dying in railroad cars sidetracked in long trains, dying in motor trucks, laboriously seeking the way back to peace, dying by scores in cottages, school houses, dying by hundreds in churches transformed into crowded hospitals, dying lying in the dirt, their sightless eyes rolled up toward a heaven of brass, flies on their lips and in their gaping wounds.
>
> If you could hear what fills my ears as I write these words, it might perhaps carry you back to still summer evenings on the porch at Sea Girt, when an easterly wind brought across the meadows the sound of breakers, except that this sullen roar of iron anger would deafen your ears to everything but its own horror; this thunder would stop the very pulsations of your heart with its sense of the billows of agony beating upon the shores of existence.
>
> If you could see what I see as I write—this woeful desolation, this Ishmaelitish waste, these stretching miles of landscape stricken, smitten, forgotten of God and accursed by men; if you could hear the tales told by French and English prisoners of the miseries which exactly repeat what we see on this side of the fatal line, I think, Mr. President, there would be no question of your "reacting" to the greatest tragedy in the history of men.

In his former relations, Dr. Hale had not found the President unresponsive to the appeal of human sympathy. He believes he will find his ear open to it now, for he writes:

> The voices of all the angels of mercy that must hover over these bloody miles would not fail to appeal to you. The inarticulate murmurs of the ghostly thousands who already lie slain, the importunate pleadings of the thousands who still await the doom of death, unless this horror of the ages soon shall cease, would reach you
>
> No one shall tell me—I will not listen to it—that it does not ache over a tragedy more gigantic, more piteous than any ever enacted while the world has rolled around. No one shall tell me unrebuked that your consciousness does not react to the most gigantic fact in human history.
>
> Is it possible that it is today within the power of one man to end this hideous thing? Is it possible that history has so contrived its mysterious processes that it lies in the hand of one man today to check this slaughter—possible that the currents of world-events today set toward the almost inconceivable opportunity that has come to a man of the western world, nurtured in years of cloistered reflection, that he may speak the compelling word, make the ecumenical gesture, before which the tired and tormented remnants of the heroes of these direful years shall drop their weapons?

Then comes the great truth, which the vast majority of war correspondents, where they were privileged to write the facts, observed long ago:

> This war is at a standstill. I have traveled 500 miles along the western German lines of defense. They cannot be broken through in a hundred years. I have seen a few squares of blood-soaked soil change masters at an awful price. I have been on the east front. Nothing can happen there appreciably to alter the decision, which might as well be rendered now as next year, or five or ten years hence.
>
> Without doubt all the governments involved know this. All are weary, weary, weary of the strife They await, Mr. President, the word that at this great moment should be spoken by the head of the chief of the neutral peoples. . . . Has there in all the story of nations ever been vouchsafed such a role as that which our beloved land might play this day—that of a very Christ among the nations, stretching out the hand that casts out devils, heals the possessed, calms the seas and restores the reign of beautiful peace?
>
> These sentences have been written in treetops overlooking the inferno of battle, by the side of roaring batteries, in blood-sodden, shell-kneaded fields, during a week of deafness and horror. It is the importunity of a more than tragic hour that impels me to transmit them to you.

Germany Makes Offers of Peace

INTENSEST interest was aroused throughout the world by the announcement in the press of December 12 that the parliaments of Germany and Austria-Hungary had been summoned in special sessions to consider a joint message from the governments of all the Teutonic allies, Turkey, Bulgaria, Austria-Hungary and Germany, which, it was forecasted, would be of world-wide historical importance. Whether the message would be one of defiance to the enemy or offers of peace, divided public opinion. In an atmosphere of great public excitement the Reichstag assembled on December 12 and received from Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, in the course of a notable speech, the announcement that the governments of all the Teutonic allies had transmitted identical notes to the neutral powers and to the Vatican declaring the readiness of the Central Powers to negotiate with their enemies for peace. These notes were handed in person to the representatives of the United States, Spain, and Switzerland for transmission to those belligerent countries, which, during the war, are represented by these neutral embassies. The notes to the neutral governments transmitting the proposals do not contain the basis of negotiations. These details, however, are deduced by diplomats at Washington from dispatches of an earlier date, and will be found elsewhere in this supplement. The notes which were dispatched to the enemies of the Central Powers by ambassadors of neutral countries as given in tho press of December 13, appear below.

Text of the Notes Proposing Peace

TO THE NEUTRAL POWERS

Addressed by Germany and her allies to the neutral powers for transmission to the Entente Allies:

“The most terrific war experienced in history has been raging for the last two years and a half over a large part of the world—a catastrophe which thousands of years of common civilization was unable to prevent and which injures the most precious achievements of humanity.

“Our aims are not to shatter nor annihilate our adversaries. In spite of our consciousness of our military and economic strength and our readiness to continue the war (which has been forced upon us) to the bitter end, if necessary; at the same time, prompted by the desire to avoid further bloodshed and make an end to the atrocities of war, the four allied powers propose to enter forthwith into peace negotiations.

“The propositions which they bring forward for such negotiations, and which have for their object a guarantee of the existence, of the honor and liberty of evolution for their nations, are, according to their firm belief, an appropriate basis for the establishment of a lasting peace.

“The four allied powers have been obliged to take up arms to defend justice and the liberty of national evolution. The glorious deeds of our armies have in no way altered their purpose. We always maintained the firm belief that our own rights and justified claims in no way control the rights of these nations.

“The spiritual and material progress which were the pride of Europe at the beginning of the twentieth century are threatened with ruin. Germany and her allies, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, gave proof of their unconquerable strength in this struggle. They gained gigantic advantages over adversaries superior in number and war material. Our lines stand unshaken against ever-repeated attempts made by armies.

“The last attack in the Balkans has been rapidly and victoriously overcome. The most recent events have demonstrated that further continuance of the war will not result in breaking the resistance of our forces, and the whole situation with regard to our troops justifies our expectation of further successes.

“If, in spite of this offer of peace and reconciliation, the struggle should go on, the four allied powers are resolved to continue to a victorious end, but they disclaim responsibility for this before humanity and history. The Imperial Government, through the good offices of your Excellency, asks the Government of [here is inserted the name of the neutral power addressed in each instance] to bring this communication to the knowledge of the Government of [here are inserted the names of the belligerents.’”

TO THE VATICAN

The note of the German Government, as presented by Dr. von Muhlberg, German Minister to the Vatican, to Cardinal Gasparri, Papal Secretary of State, reads as follows:

“According to instructions received I have the honor to send to your Eminence a copy of the declaration of the Imperial Government today, which by the good offices of the Powers intrusted with the protection of German interests in the countries with which the German Empire is in a state of War, transmits to these States, and in which the Imperial Government declares itself ready to enter into peace negotiations. The Austro-Hungarian, Turkish, and Bulgarian Governments also have sent similar notes.

“The reasons which prompted Germany and her allies to take this step are manifest. For two years and a half a terrible war has been devastating tho European Continent. Unlimited treasures of civilization havo been destroyed. Extensive areas have been soaked with blood. Millions of brave soldiers have fallen in battle and millions havo returned home as invalids. Grief and sorrow fill almost every house.

“Not only upon the belligerent nations but also upon neutrals the destructive consequences of the gigantic struggle weigh heavily. Trade and commerce, carefully built up in years of peace, have been depressed. The best forces of the nation have been withdrawn from the production of useful objects. Europe, which formerly was devoted to tho propagation of religion and civilization, which was trying to find solutions for social problems and was the home of science and art and all peaceful labor, now resembles an immense war camp, in which the achievements and works of many decades are doomed to annihilation.

“Germany is carrying on a war of defense against her enemies, which aim at her destruction. She fights to assuro the integrity of her frontiers and the liberty of the German nation, for the right which she claims to develop freely hor intellectual and economic energies in peaceful competition and on an equal footing with other nations. All the efforts of their enemies are unable to shatter the heroic armies of the (Teutonic) allies, which protect the frontiers of their countries, strengthened by the certainty that the enemy shall never pierce the iron wall.

“Thoso fighting on the front know that they are supported by the whole nation, which is inspired by love for its country and is ready for the greatest sacrifices and determined to defend to the last extremity the inherited treasure of intellectual and economic work and the social organization and sacred soil of the country.

“Certain of our own strength, but realizing Europe’s sad future if the war continues; seized with pity in the face of the unspeakable misery of humanity the German Empire, in accord with her allies, solemnly repeats what the Chancellor already has declared, a year ago, that Germany is ready to give peace to the world by setting before the whole world the question whether or not it is possible to find a basis for an understanding.

“Since the first day of the Pontifical reign his Holiness the Pope has unswervingly demonstrated, in the most generous fashion, his solicitude for the innumerablo victims of this war. He has alleviated the sufferings and ameliorated the fate of thousands of men injured by this catastrophe. Inspired by the exalted ideas of his ministry, his Holiness has seized every opportunity in the interests of humanity to end so sanguinary a war.

“The Imperial Government is firmly confident that the initiative of the four powers will find friendly welcome on the part of his Holiness, and that the work of peace can count upon the precious support of the Holy See.”

Separate Official Austrian Statement

‘WHEN in the Summer of 1914 the patience of Austria-Hungary was exhausted by a series of systematically continued and ever increasing provocations and menaces, and the monarchy, after almost fifty years of unbroken peace, found itself compelled to draw the sword, this weighty decision was animated neither by aggressive purposes nor by designs of conquest, but solely by the bitter necessity of self-defense, to defend its existence and safeguard itself for the future against similar treacherous plots of hostile neighbors.

“That was the task and aim of tho monarchy in the present war. In combination with its allies, well tried in loyal comradeship in arms, the Austro-Hungarian Army and Fleet, fighting, bleeding, but also assailing and conquering, gained such successes that they frustrated the intentions of the enemy. The quadruple alliance not only has won an immense series of victories, but also holds in its power extensive hostile territories. Unbroken is its strength, as our latest treacherous enemy has just experienced.

“Can our enemies hope to conquer or shatter this alliance of powers? They will never succeed in breaking it by blockade and starvation measures. Their war aims, to the attainment of which they have come no nearer in the third year of the war, will in the future be proved to have been completely unattainable. Useless and unavailing, therefore, is the prosecution of the fighting on the part of the enemy.

“The powers of the Quadruple Alliance, on the other hand, have effectively pursued their aims, namely, defense against attacks on their existence and integrity, which were planned in concert long since, and the achievement of real guarantees, and they will never allow themselves to be deprived of the basis of their existence, which they have secured by advantages won.

“The continuation of the murderous war, in which the enemy can destroy much, but cannot—as the Quadruple Alliance is firmly confidont—alter fate, is ever more seen to be an aimless destruction of human lives and property, an act of inhumanity justified by no necessity and a crimo against civilization.

“This conviction, and the hope that similar views may also be begun to be entertained in the enemy camp, has caused the idea to ripen in the Vienna Cabinet—in full agreement with the Governments of the allied [Teutonic] powers—of making a candid and loyal endeavor to come to a discussion with their enemies for the purpose of paving a way for peace.

“The Governments of Austria-Hungary, Germany, Turkey, and Bulgaria have addressed today identical notes to the diplomatic representatives in the capitals concerned who are intrusted with the promotion of enemy nationals expressing an inclination to enter into peace negotiations and requesting them to transmit this overture to enemy States. This step was simultaneously brought to the knowledge of the representatives of the Holy See in a special note, and the active interest of the Pope for this offer of peace was solicited. Likewise the accredited representatives of tho remaining neutral States in the four capitals were acquainted with this proceeding for the purposo of informing their Governments.

“Austria and her allies by this step have given new and decisive proof of their love of peace. It is now for their enemies to make known their views before the world.

“Whatever tho result of its proposal may be, no responsibility can fall on the Quadruple Alliance even beforo the judgment seat of its own peoples, if it is eventually obliged to continue the war.”

Possible Basis for Negotiation

NEWS dispatches of December 13 indicated that the German Proposal of Peace might result in a “Round Table” conference at The Hague some time in January which would be held while armies still fought and at which both groups of combatants could exchange views as to causes of the war, the principles now involved and the fundamental elements of peace. It was suggested that formal statements of terms might be withheld by both sides until such a conference. From unofficial Dutch sources it was intimated that Germany and her allies were willing to consider as a basis of peace the return by Germany of all occupied territories except Poland and Lithuania, Poland at least to be created an independent kingdom, Russia possibly to receive from Austria some territorial compensation for Lithuania; the return to Germany of her colonies, and a guarantee to Germany against hostile invasion through Belgium. From the German embassy in Washington it was suggested that Germany would be willing to make peace on the basis of the status quo before the war, this to include the complete restoration of Belgium and northern France, but to permit some readjustment of Balkan boundaries and the retention by Turkey of Constantinople. Germany was reported as willing to give up Kiauchau and her Pacific Islands but not her African colonies, which latter another report represented her as willing to trade for the French colonies. England and her allies are reported as ready to insist that no peace can be concluded except on a basis of complete restoration of Belgium and Serbia and the destruction of “Prussian militarism.”

For the Healing of the Nations

A Merry (Christmas) Heart Doeth Good Like a Medicine

ONCE upon a time the whole world was without Christmas. But only one-half the world is without Christmas today. In that half, instead of Santa Claus with red hood and ow-white whiskers, they have Mars with red hands nd a death-white face. In that half, instead of ughter is weeping; instead of giving there is begging; stead of family reunions there are families that will ver again be united.

A skeleton at the Christmas feast! A Christmas esence that cannot be ignored! A state of things the world that makes impossible a Merry Christmas! ebel as we may, insist as we may that in spite of erything our Christmas shall be the same old erry day, we cannot escape from that face peering at the window, that skeleton face of starving urope.

If at the window of your dining-room, as you began o make merry about your Christmas feast, there appeared the aunt face of a starving woman ho hugged to her lean breast dead baby, your merriment ould quickly die out. You ould, and you undoubtedly would, agerly bring her into the warmth your home. You would say oothing words to her, press her nto a chair, and give her comorting food, and bid her hope on or better days. You would try o instil something of the Christmas joy into her broken heart. ou would experience yourselves he real joy of the Christmas pirit, but merriment would be ver with.

Twenty-five million homeless uman beings abroad on the face of he earth at Christmas time, 1916! fourth of the population of the nited States! To say nothing f countless homes in those parts f Europe where war itself has ot set its foot, but from whence ar has recruited its armies, leavng desolate households to mourn or warriors slain on a hundred battlefields who but a few months before were bread-winners. Who an estimate the woe that has ettled down upon the world at his Christmas time, 1916!

THIS is the skeleton at the Christmas feast this year. If t were something of our own private concern, some burden hat you or I were bearing, some private grief, we might, for the sake of others and for the sake of he day, hide it away out of sight or twenty-four hours, and at east pretend to be merry. Even f our hearts were bowed down by he suffering or the death of some one most dear to us, we could ook up through our tears on Christmas Day and rejoice in Christ our Saviour. But that starving woman and her dead baby by our dining-room window is a different kind of grief. We can't hide that away; we can't ignore it; we can't make it easier for her by smiling through our tears. Hers are the tears, hers the dull weight of woe.

And the one tremendous outstanding world fact on Christmas Day, 1916, is that 25,000,000 human hearts have been needlessly, wantonly, cruelly robbed of every joy by war. Greatly as we might desire as a people to celebrate Christmas Day with every circumstance of merriment and joy, we simply cannot do so and lift our eyes to God. If we would still make this Christmas Day a day of rejoicing (not lighthearted merriment), a day of genuine rejoicing, we must bring that gaunt woman into our home and do our utmost to revive in her heart the hope that has died.

And while Christmas Day, 1916, is marred by the greatest blot upon the history of the race, save that of Calvary, it may still be ennobled by turning it into a day of mercy for the afflicted peoples across the seas.

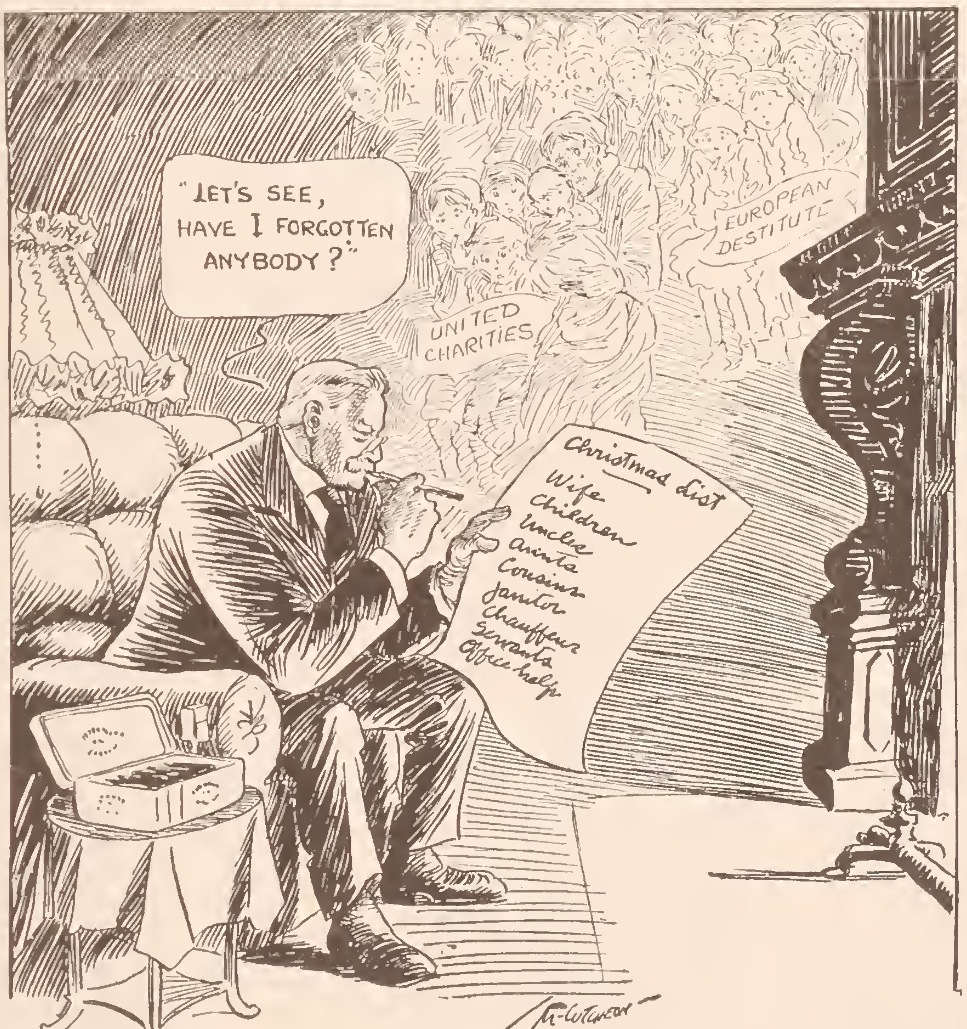
IT is the prerogative of God to be merciful to the unmerciful and forgiving to the unforgiving, if he wills. We who profess the name of Christ call ourselves the children of God. It is our prerogative, then, to overlook the discouraging fact that the nations of Europe have wilfully brought this terrible condition of things upon their populations. It is our prerogative to shut our eyes to the many who, still affluent in the capitals of Europe, aro indifferent to the misery all around them. It would be human in us to say, "Let Europe look after those she has impoverished; let the traders in these countries, who are waxing rich through war, be taxed for the support of those they are making poor by war. Europe is still able to provide for her poor. Why should the Christian people of the United States deny themselves in order to give to the wards of France and Germany and Russia and England?"

There is one, and only one, answer to this very natural question: Europe is not taking care of her wards; and unless Christian hearts the world around shame this vast injustice by succoring Europe's poor for her, by the thousands they will perish day by day. We remember the scene on the seashore when Jesus summoned one of his disciples to service, while another stood near. The first then inquired what would be expected of that other. "What is that to thee?" replied the Master; "follow thou me."

Customs have grown up about Christmas which, delightful though they are, still tend to dull our ears to the one message of Christmas, "Follow thou me." "Son, give me thine heart." "I gave my all for thee; what hast thou given for me?" Gifts at Christmas time. The two gifts that God has asked of us are our hearts and our service. We are not asked to stand in judgment on the world, or to speculate with exactness as to the merit of this and that opportunity to do something in His Name, or to define ways and means for others to serve him. Insistently, as a chord that ever resounds through a great harmony, there runs throughout the whole of Scripture a call to service in behalf of the down-trodden, the oppressed, the sorrowing and the poor. And now on Christmas Day, 1916, the Christian world is confronted by an almost overwhelming condition of sorrowing and need. What a supreme opportunity is this to celebrate a Christmas in the highest manner, the most fitting manner that could possibly be!

HIS CHRISTMAS LIST

[Copyright: 1916: By John-T McCutcheon.]



YET why should the children be left out of this higher Christmas joy, making merry only? How beautiful a thing it would be if, at this Christmas season, there should be started in America a movement that would enlist the tender sympathy and eager helpfulness of every child on behalf of the pitiable children in Europe! What would not Christmas forever mean for that child who begins on this Christmas Day to feel himself a part of the great household of God whose privilege it is to lift up the fallen, to bind up the broken hearts, to dry tears of grief. Scarcely a child is too young to feel pity. And Christmas has been called the Children's Day.

If Europe could be forgotten, if we could draw down the shade and shut out that starving face—but we can't, so why talk about the thousand and one things that make for a Merry Christmas in our land today? How much of what makes possible a Merry Christmas the length and breadth of our land today is intertwined with the conduct of the war in Europe? Too much by far. Too much to disentangle so that we can put the war out of mind in order to enjoy our prosperity. In individual homes there is, of course, a great deal to rejoice over, to make merry over, in which the war in Europe has no part. As a people we are innocent of this great transgression. But as a Christian people we are not ignorant of it. There is one way and one only by which to rob it of its sting on Christmas Day, and that is by resolving to do our utmost part in alleviating the suffering. And as Christmas Day would never be Christmas Day without the children, this supreme act in celebration of the day should include the children.

For Christian homes, then, this Christmas Day, 1916, may well mark a new appreciation of what the day means. It may well become tho happiest Christmas Day in our lives and the lives of our children. It may become the day when each of us and the children of our households shall realize anew why Christ was given to the world. And so, after all, it may indeed be a Merry Christmas, merry with the exultant realization that we have undertaken to lift a terrible burden from human hearts, that we have set out on this Christmas Day, we and our children, and especially our children, to undo as far as it is possible the evil work that war has wrought in millions of lives; to undo the heavy burdens, lift up the fallen, deliver the oppressed, and dry the tears in that half of the world where this year there is no Christmas.

JESUS IS KING

A CHRISTMAS SERMON

By Rev. Chas. E. Jefferson D.D.

TEXT—Matt. 2:2. "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?"

IT was a question asked by certain travelers who had come to Jerusalem from the East, and the man most troubled by the question was King Herod. The reason of this was that Herod was a ruler himself, and he did not wish to have another king inside of his dominions. There is never room for two thrones in one kingdom. Herod at once made diligent inquiries as to the section of the country in which the new-born King had arrived, and when he was told that he was to be found in Bethlehem, he ordered every male child in that village under two years of age to be murdered. Thus determined was he to get rid of a possible disputer of his sovereignty. Blood flowed because the baby came into the world with the title of King.

What happened at the beginning of Jesus' life went on happening to the end. The Herods of Palestine were always in a state of perturbation, and were constantly plotting to kill him. The kings of political and social and ecclesiastical life were from the start distrustful of him. He jeopardized the security of their thrones. If he had been willing to play the part of a gentle and sympathetic physician, making war on the empire of pain, the whole land would have chanted his praises. But he claimed to be King! Had he been content to be the expounder of beautiful ideas, the interpreter of glowing ideals, his countrymen would have listened to him with pleasure, and he would have gone with honors to his grave. But he claimed to be King! Had he been satisfied to be a friend and companion, consoling men in their sorrows and helping them in their difficulties, many roses would have been strewn on his path, and he would have won a high place on the roll of benefactors. But he claimed to be King! He was always acting in a way which implied regal distinction. He had a manner of speaking altogether unique. He awed men, and at the same time exasperated them. They did not like to hear a peasant speak as though his word were final. He made demands on men's consciences which aroused opposition. He expected of them a more implicit obedience than had been demanded by Solomon or Moses. He did not hesitate to ask men to lay down their life for him. This is the fashion of kings. He said one day to a company of disciples: "Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you." Only monarchs speak with so peremptory an intonation. No wonder men asked in perplexity: "Who is this?"

And yet he did not look like a king. He had none of the pomp and circumstance of kings. He wore no crown. He wielded no scepter. His robe was not purple. He did not ride in a chariot or on a horse. No retinue of armed men followed him up and down the land. He did not shake the earth with his tread. In no respect did he live up to the part of an Oriental ruler. To his contemporaries his claim to kingship seemed preposterous, and sometimes blasphemous. For he did not hesitate to claim to be monarch in the vast realm of the spirit. One day he sketched a picture of the judgment day, and he placed himself upon the throne. He told parables which implied that the final destinies of men were in his hand. A robber in the hour of death asked him to remember him when he came into his kingdom. On one of the last Sundays of his life Jesus allowed the crowd to chant around him the words of an ancient Hebrew poet: "Blessed is the King that cometh in the name of the Lord!" They called him King, and he did not rebuke them.

IT was this assertion of his kingship which caused the storm to break at last on Jesus' head. The crowd which thronged the door of Pilate's court-room shouted loud and long: "We found this man saying that he himself is Christ a King!" Here was a charge direct and clear, which Pilate as a Roman governor was bound to take notice of. Calling Jesus aside he asked him bluntly: "Art thou a king?" And the answer which the prisoner returned so awed the heart of Pilate that he scarcely knew what to do. He desired to get rid as soon as possible of a man the like of whom he had never seen before; but when he suggested granting him release, the crowd blazed with an indignation that melted down the Roman's resolution. Above the Babel of discordant shoutings came clear and strong the words: "If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar!" It was this cry which broke the procurator's will. He could not in safety release a man who was claiming to be a king. Tiberius Cæsar brooked no rivals. Setting the prisoner before the crowd, he exclaimed, "Behold your King!" and with one accord they screamed: "Away with him! Away with him! Crucify him!" The chief priests chimed in, saying, "We have no king but Cæsar!" It was because Jesus claimed to be a King that the Jews and Romans decreed that he should die. Over his head was written in the three chief languages of the world: "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." Jesus Christ was crucified because he claimed to be King.

The tragedy narrated in the Gospels is only the story of a tragedy continued to the present hour. Jesus still claims to be King; but now as of old Herod is enraged against him, and the multitudes shout: "We will not have this man to reign over us!" As a genial and gentle teacher, Jesus has many admirers. His teachings are extolled by all who have minds capable of appreciating high and noble thought. The whole world is glad to praise him as an ethical guide without a peer. The moral precepts promulgated in the Sermon on the Mount are eulogized by men of many schools. One of his rules has been labeled "golden" by the common consent of mankind, and the picture of the Good Samaritan has been hung up as a sacred picture in the gallery of the soul of the world. The multitudes are eager to praise and honor Jesus as a teacher, a philosopher, a poet, an idealist, a reformer, a lover of humanity. They hesitate only when they are asked to crown him King.

And yet it is at this point that he is most insistent and inexorable. Obedience is the one virtue for which he contends from first to last. Without obedience he promises no man salvation. It is only the obedient heart which is able to understand his words. Men are to show their love for him by obeying him, and it is by this obedience that the world is to be redeemed. No one is permitted to count himself a disciple who is not willing to obey. This is the tone of all kings. They demand swift and absolute subjection to their will. Their will is law, and peace and prosperity are found only in obedience. Jesus stakes everything on his kingship. His whole religion is foundationed on the fact that he is King.

CHRISTMAS is coming, and at Christmas we naturally think of Jesus. Which Jesus are you going to think about? Shall it be the Jesus of picture, or the Jesus of song? The Jesus of the artists is a lovely figure to gaze upon. For centuries the multitudes have looked upon that face and are not yet wearied. The Jesus of song is still more beautiful. "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds in a believer's ear!" Jesus has been the theme of innumerable anthems, and oratorios, and cantatas, and carols, and all of us are ready every year to join in singing the Christmas songs. The Jesus of the Biblical narrative is also entertaining. We never grow weary of hearing the story of the baby who was born in Bethlehem, and whose mother laid him in a manger.

The world has long had the Jesus of song and picture and story, but alas! the world is very sad today. There is not peace on earth, and there is a scarcity of good will. Singing about Jesus is not enough, nor is looking at the pictured face of Jesus sufficient, nor is celebrating the birthday of Jesus adequate. The Jesus of God is a King, and nothing but obedience to Jesus will lift the world out of its distresses. How solemn are his words: "Not every one that says, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you!" He puts to us the question with which he confounded his disciples in Jerusalem: "Why do ye call me Lord, and do not the things which I say?" These are words we need to ponder amid the festivities of Christmas. Where is he that is born King?

FOR an illustration of the futility of worship without obedience, let us turn our eyes toward Europe. Europe is the oldest of the Christian continents. It is there that the Gospels have been read the longest, and that Christian worship has been carried on with the greatest solemnity and beauty. In Europe the cathedrals are most abundant and majestic, and vast multitudes have for centuries offered prayer in the name of Jesus. But Europe is today baptized into a baptism of blood and tears, and the music of the angels' song is well-nigh completely drowned by the hideous thunder of cannon. How are we to account for a catastrophe so heartbreaking? Has not Europe fallen into a ditch because of her disobedience? She has said, "Lord, Lord," in her churches, but in the council chambers of her rulers she has not done the things which Jesus commanded. She has painted beautiful pictures of the Prince of Peace, but to many of her statesmen have been worshipers of th god of war. She has sung hymns of praise to Christ a God, but too many of her diplomats have adopte policies which have ignored his plain teaching. Fo generations the leading nations of Europe have bee preparing for battle. Her kings have taken pride i the glitter and paraphernalia of armies and navie Her leading counselors have gloried in military preparedness, and nations have been ranked by th weight of metal they had hammered into instrument of blood. Christmas was celebrated each year, but th King Christ was steadily ignored. He was permitte to be King in the home, but not in the capitol. Boy and girls were taught the virtues of patience an forgiveness and good will, but in statecraft thes principles were derided. In the family circle ever one was taught to be considerate and generous an self-sacrificing, but in the circles to which was committed the guidance of nations the virtues mos extolled were the virtues which had been developed i the camp of Cæsar. It was boldly proclaimed that th sayings of Jesus cannot be wisely applied to nationa affairs. What he says is for the guidance of individua only, and is mischievous when made the rule by whic nations must walk. The state, men said, is suprem It can submit to no will other than its own. In th way leaders openly and defiantly shouted: "We wi not have this Man to reign over us."

And so for many years European politics has bee anti-Christian. Individuals were trained to trust or another, but nations were systematically educated t suspect one another. Men and women were taught t love, while empires and kingdoms and republics wer educated to fear. In an atmosphere of suspicion an fear the Christian lights all burn low. Christ is th enemy of suspicion and fear, and these cannot flouris in his presence. Deadly weapons are an abominatio to him, and squandering the money of the people o instruments of destruction is a sin which soon or la brings awful retribution. He would not be King wer he to allow such disobedience to go on without punishment. Kings cannot allow themselves to be continuously and outrageously disobeyed. Europe coul not be permitted to go on indefinitely using the nam of Jesus, while doing the behests of Mars. Maneuve ing with guns is a poor substitute for the service whic Christ has commanded. Military drill is a debasin superstition which nations must cast off if they ar not to be utterly destroyed. Nations which love th sword, and brandish the sword, and take delight i posing in shining armor are not treading that gloriou path which shines brighter and brighter to the perfe day!

This is the most terrible of all wars because it fought in that part of the world where there has bee most light. Our responsibility is measured by ou privileges, and we are judged according to our know edge. "That servant which knew his Lord's wil and made not ready, nor did according to his wil shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that kne not, and did things worthy of stripes, shall be beate with few stripes. And to whomsoever much is given of him shall much be required; and to whom the commit much, of him will they ask the more."

THESE are words of the King of kings, and the should not be forgotten in the midst of our Chris mas jubilations. God through the experiences of Europe is exhorting America to watch and pray lest sh also choose the fatal path Europe has followed th counsels of men reputedly wise, but no men are reall wise unless they have the mind of Christ. Every leade is to be repudiated who offers counsel contrary to th counsel of the One whom the Almighty has anointed He is the King of the earth and the Saviour. God ha made of one blood all nations to live together, and i judging the world by that Man whom he has ordained Let us not then be sentimental, and imagine that w can please the Almighty by singing songs about Jesus and then going ahead and doing as we choose. We ar under the reign of law. We are in the grip of on from whom there is no escape. There is a Herod in u who defies him. The problem of our life is to brin the Herod in us into subjection to Christ the King Herod is of the earth earthy. Herod lives solely fo himself. Herod is averse to service and to sacrifice Herod despises the way of the cross. Herod is alway planning to murder Jesus. He would murder him because Jesus insists on being King. It is God's wi that Jesus should be the Ruler of our heart, an Christmas is an angel from the court of heaven sen to remind us that all who are wise lay at the feet of th King the gold and frankincense and myrrh of a obedient life.

Say So!

SUNDAY, December 24. Ps. 107 : 2. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so." You would have thought they could not have helped saying so. They have had marvelous happenings in their souls and they have said nothing about it. It is amazing what men can experience and yet retain their silence. It is possible to be a dumb participant in grace. There are emancipated slaves who never mention their deliverance. There are men and women who have been lifted out of the horrible pit and out of the miry clay, who are never heard going along the road with a new song in their mouths. People receive marvelous comfort in sorrow, strange cordials and balms, who never refer to their healing. This is the tragedy of dumb discipleship. It is possible to come into the riches of the love of Christ and yet never call the Lover's name. You would think they would mention it because they could not help it. You would assume that their silence would be broken under the sheer compulsion of a great joy, or by the equally powerful constraint of an upspringing praise.

But there is another reason besides that of common gratitude why we should open our lips in glad and reverent testimony. The sincere witnessing to a secret spiritual happening strengthens and enriches the experience. If I may so put it, we oxygenate our inner life when we give it sacred expression. That is so with our feelings. Feelings that are dumb are apt to become faint. Gratitude which never says "Thank you" has a very precarious life. Pity which hugs itself in secret soon passes away. These feelings are strengthened and confirmed by a wise publicity. And so it is with truth. We grasp truth with a firmer hand as soon as we begin to give it away. The disciple is never matured until he becomes an apostle. When we proclaim the Gospel to another man it reveals itself in new brightness and glory. If we live unto ourselves we surely die. In this, as in all other matters, the secret of saving one's life is to give it away; in losing it we have it forever. And therefore, "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so."

And we must "say so" because the living witness is one of the great ministries by which the heavenly life is to be transmitted to others. We cannot overestimate the quickening influence of a really vital testimony to the renewing energies of grace, and to the providential leadings of our God. When an honest man, speaking about these things, reverently and strongly says "I know," his assurance seizes the timidities and the hesitancies of others and consolidates them into a regal strength. The firm and quiet word of the believer provides the antidote to panic, and transforms many a trembling deserter into a courageous soldier of the Lord. And never had the believer more wonderful opportunities for witnessing than he has today. It is the hour of the lay-witness. Would that all the Lord's servants were prophets! Let us tell what we have seen; let us proclaim what we have known. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!" J. H. J.

Our Heart's Desire

MONDAY, December 25. Ps. 20 : 4. "Grant thee thy heart's desire." The prayer of the psalmist that Jehovah shall grant us the desires of our hearts is the great prayer of the Bible, for the development and culture of the heart is the fundamental need for this world and the world to come.

Study the Bible with the object of finding its teaching about the importance of training the human heart. It may surprise you. "Love Jehovah with all your heart," says Moses. We are told that "God looketh on the heart," and that he "healeth the broken in heart," and that the righteous "shall sing for joy of heart," and that we should pray for an "understanding heart." Jesus says, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also"; and he gives the Word which has been a lamp to the feet of thousands, when he says, "Let not your heart be troubled!" Paul dwells upon the need of "singleness of heart," of the "pure heart," and the "heart of compassion," and repeatedly do we find instances in the Scriptures of God "searching the heart," "enlightening the heart," and giving men "new hearts," upon which he writes his laws.

The Buddhist held that all human desire was a fault; but the Bible lifts up the heart's desire to a place of eminence, for the heart is the organ of the future, the most unfilled of all earthly things, the seat of the great human incompleteness, since it is the dwelling-place of love. It was to the heart that the Master spoke when, amid that little band of friends, he uttered his loving farewell: "I go to prepare a place for you."

Fear not when your heart is torn with perplexities and cares and griefs; it is this deep training and exercise that is preparing the part of you for which the City of God was builded, to inhabit the Temple of completeness, the Temple of Love. C. S. C.

The Christ-Life in Our Lives

TUESDAY, December 26. John 1 : 4. "The Life was the Light of men." All true life is luminous. When on a summer night you sail over the Mediterranean, hard by the African coast, the vessel leaves a long track of phosphorescent glory in its wake. Multitudes of infinitesimal insects, suddenly disturbed, yield their tiny torch to the general illumination.

And who does not know of some community which has become lit up by the radiance of some noble life! The life of a great and good man lights up a cityful of people. Evil is abashed, good encouraged. Mordecai, for instance, in the closing verses that tell the story of his triumph, was great among the Jews and accepted by his brethren, "seeking the good of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed." Surely his life was light.

But how much more was this the case with our Lord! The whole world has been lighted, not only by his words, but by the inimitable beauty of his character. And now, when he enters into contact with any soul of man, with any mortal life; when he infuses his own life-force and vitalizing energy, his life in our hearts becomes light in our lives.

Make much of the living Christ. Have no mercy on your self-life. Deny it, refuse to let it descend from the cross; so will the divine life expand and grow within you, whilst the night of unbelief and sin will become light in the Lord. "Arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." F. B. M.

The Duty of Soul-Preparation

WEDNESDAY, December 27. Amos 4 : 4–13· "Prepare to meet thy God." We must not rush heedlessly into the presence-chamber. We would not in the case of an earthly ruler, and we certainly ought to cherish the spirit of thoughtful reverence as we enter the presence before which angels veil their faces with their wings and the heavens are not clean. "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few." We wash our hands before exchanging the work of the day for the refinement of social fellowship. We wipe our shoes on the door-mat as we pass from the street into the home. Considerable pains are requisite to conform to the formalities that hedge around a monarch. So should we see to it that we adjust ourselves to the high code of heavenly etiquette and courtesy.

Prepare to meet thy God by spending a few moments of silence before commencing to pray. Prepare by considering if a brother has aught against you; because if he has, you must leave the vestibule of heaven and seek to be reconciled to your brother, before you can offer an acceptable gift. Prepare by putting on the white robe—"These are they who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore are they before the throne." Prepare by remembering that you are accepted in the Beloved, that your High Priest waits to mingle his incense with your prayers, and that the Holy Spirit will help your infirmity. F. B. M.

The Individual and the Community

THURSDAY, December 28. Rev. 22 : 1, 2 (R.V.). "He showed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, in the midst of the street thereof. And on this side of the river and on that was the tree of life, bearing twelve manner of fruits, yielding its fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." A friend comes to me and says: "I don't believe in all this socialized religion, these playgrounds, and soup kitchens, and institutional churches. Christ emphasized the individual. If you save and develop the individual spiritually, the community will take care of itself."

Another one says: "This individualism in your churches, this devotional business, prayers and singing hymns, does not appeal to me. Christianity should be a service. Jesus went about doing good. The community, not the individual, is the thing for religion."

Thus we have two distinct and different views as to what Christianity should be and do, one aimed at the individual, the other at society.

John, in his vision of the completed City of God, combines these, placing the trees of the garden along the streets, the plants of the tree of life along the thoroughfare; the leaves of the tree have become a beneficent part of the community, and the community has become a part of them. It is a marriage of the spiritual and the social in the City of God.

This is what we want; not the lonely individual staying in the garden amongst his flowers of spirituality and prayers, but taking his leaves of healing and covering the nations with them. The community gives the field and the meaning to our spiritual powers. The life of mercantile traffic gets overgrown with indifference, becomes "dead in trespasses and sins"; it lacks the "twelve manner of fruits" which the individual brings out of his quiet meditation with God, to reanimate it. He who points his prayer-life, not inward to his own troubled heart, but outward to the healing of the town and the nation, is the Christian. He has seen God alone, in order that he may better see him in his brother man. C. S. C.

The Whole Gospel in a Line

FRIDAY, December 29. John 1 : 29. "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." "Where is the lamb for the sacrifice," asked Isaac, breaking in upon his father's unwonted silence and absorption, as they together climbed the slopes of Mount Moriah. For centuries the world had awaited the answer. Finally John gave it in these words. As the Baptist spoke thus, surely Isaiah 53 was in his thought, where the prophet describes the Servant of Jehovah as led like a lamb to the slaughter, whilst the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.

Here is the whole Gospel! The entire sun is reflected in this dew-drop. Jesus is God's Lamb. His cleansing blood is available for the sins of the whole wide world, and for me. Not a soul affected by connection with our fallen race is excluded from the scope of Christ's all-sufficing propitiation for sin. Here is the clue to his mysterious anguish; and we must ever maintain the posture of beholding him.

You may behold wealth without being richer, or beauty without becoming beautiful, or the achievement of science without becoming a scholar, but you cannot behold Jesus Christ, living, loving, dying, pleading, without being changed into his image, and like him impelled, if needs be, to lay down your life for others. It is at your peril that you refuse to behold God's dearly beloved Son! F. B. M.

While It Is Yet Called Today

SATURDAY, December 30. Ps. 95 : 7. "Today if ye will hear his voice."

> "Live, live today. Tomorrow never yet
> On any human being rose or set."

Golden opportunities improved mean golden streets possessed. Opportunity knows no tomorrow, for the life of immortals is one eternal now. One cannot act in the past or in the future; destiny is decided today. This is the point of time, the moment's space, that helps mold characters for the Parthenon of the skies. Many build only a temporary amusement show in this life.

> "Build ye more stately mansions, O my soul!"

Birth is the beginning of death, and death the beginning of life. Humanity is in an endless procession toward the golden fields of the silent land. All we leave on this side is our influence, more lasting than monuments. If we trust Christ and live for him today, nothing will harm us in all the future years. The past is a sample of blessedness blossoming in the fields of Providence every year. It is eloquent with voices of warning and hope. The past is full of memories of millions who have bequeathed to us inventions, discoveries, truths and civilizations. We have entered into their labors by acting in the ever-living present. We enjoy the liberties they died for, if we exercise eternal vigilance. E. W. C.

Congress Reassembles. The second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress began at noon on Monday, December 4. The high cost of living seemed to lead all other issues, eleven measures being introduced in the House, each aiming to correct high prices by one expedient or another. One embargo bill was offered in the Senate. The most comprehensive plan was included in four bills introduced by Representative John J. Fitzgerald of New York, which provided for an absolute embargo for one year on exports of farm products or manufactured foodstuffs, the modification of the parcel post to permit shipments of farm products up to 150 pounds in weight at a special low rate, the prohibition of interstate shipment of foodstuffs (except butter) stored longer than ten months, and the branding of all articles held in cold storage with the original date of admission, and empowering the President at any time within two years, if the public interests shall so require, to prohibit the export of food products. It appeared probable that a majority would be hard to obtain for an embargo measure. The Department of Agriculture is reported to have made a country-wide investigation, which is said to show an unwarrantably wide margin between prices paid to producers and those paid by consumers. It was announced as Congress convened that the total appropriations to be asked for the fulfilment of the national defense plan would be $752,123,457.63. This is about $137,000,000 more than the appropriations for the current year.

The estimates of the probable cost of the government for the year laid before Congress by the Treasury Department follow, cents being omitted:

Legislative	$13,524,479
Executive	688,370
State Department	6,315,847
Treasury Department	165,681,233
Independent offices	8,130,724
District of Columbia	17.885,026
War Department	382,497.537
Panama Canal	25,145,562
Navy Department	382,497,537
Interior Department	210.161,412
Post Office Department	1,765,760
Department of Agriculture	43,331,907
Department of Commerce	16.737,158
Department of Labor	4,690,677
Department of Justice	11,555,696
Total	$1,268,715,834

December 5, in his annual address to the Congress, President Wilson confined himself entirely to domestic problems. He reminded Congress that at the close of the last session he had recommended an immediate increase in and the administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission; approval of a rate increase to be granted by the Commerce Commission to cover expenses to the Eight-Hour Law; a provision making strikes or lock-outs illegal until after examination by a competent commission; and the giving to the executive of power to take over and operate the railroads in case of military necessity. Explaining his recommendation for a broadening of the means for arbitration and conciliation to include the investigation of labor questions before strikes occur, the President said: "The country cannot and should not consent to remain any longer exposed to profound industrial disturbances for lack of additional means of arbitration and conciliation, which the Congress can easily and promptly supply." He said that he would hesitate to suggest that any man at any occupation should be obliged by law to continue in an employment which he desired to leave. "But," he said, "this proposal is based upon a very different principle; that the concerted action of powerful bodies of men shall not be permitted to stop the industrial processes of the nation before the nation shall have had an opportunity to acquaint itself with the merits of the case. . . . I can see nothing in that proposal but the justifiable safeguarding by society of the necessary processes of its very life." The President also recommended thorough and systematic regulation of the spending of money in elections, and urged upon the House the passage of the bill which has already passed the Senate providing for the promotion of vocational and industrial education.

Protecting Our Feathered Allies. Having been sanctioned by Great Britain, the treaty between the United States and Canada for the protection of migratory bird life is now in effect. The most vital provisions of the treaty are: that no bird important to agriculture as an insect destroyer shall be shot at any time; that no open season on game birds shall be for longer than three and one-half months; that both governments shall restrict open seasons to protect game birds during the breeding season and that there shall be no shipment from one country to the other of birds taken contrary to law.

Menocal's Reelection in Doubt. The presidential election in Cuba was so close that the outcome is not yet definitely known. Partial reelections must be held in two provinces.

Our Investment In Transportation. Figures presented to the Newlands Joint Commission, which is investigating the transportation systems of the country, show that the railways of the United States were capitalized in 1915 at $9,071,535,641, and the total of stock and bonds was $21,725,705,898, a gain since 1910 of $3,274,783,866. The total income of the railways decreased from 5.35 per cent. of the gross capitalization in 1910 to 3.76 per cent. in 1915. Senator Newlands stated just before the opening of Congress that his commission could not complete its work within the time limit, and would ask for an extension of time.

The Annual Sacrifice to Sport. According to careful compilations, football in 1916 caused eighteen deaths. The hunting season is credited by the Chicago Tribune with eighty-six deaths and forty-one serious injuries, twenty-two of the deaths occurring in Michigan, where it was said 10,000 hunters combed the woods for deer.

Speaking "United States." Commissioner John H. Finley of the New York State Department of Education, addressing the Association of Teachers of English at the Hotel Astor, New York, recently, said in reference to the language spoken in America: "We seem to be forming a language that bears a remote resemblance to the English language." Professor Scott of the University of Michigan said: "American speech at any period will be that which . . . gives adequate utterance to the best that is in the American character. American speech . . . is gradually assuming a form appropriate to our character and daily needs." According to the professors, therefore, when we ask a man to please "talk United States," we are merely asking him to make use of the most modern development of the Anglo-Saxon tongue.

Federal Trade Commission Recommends Trusts. In its report at the opening of Congress, the Federal Trade Commission recommended legislation that will permit the organization by American manufacturers and shippers of trusts for foreign commerce to buy raw materials and to sell goods. The commission believes that we can permit cooperation for export trade without lessening competition within our borders.

Carranza Opens Constitutional Congress. The Congress to revise the Mexican constitution was opened by General Carranza on December 1. All of the states of Mexico were reported as being represented except the state of Chiapas, in which Felix Diaz is operating. Carranza called attention to the fact that the constitution of 1857 proclaimed only general principles of reform without furnishing the machinery for putting them in practice; what was desired first was to establish the rights of the people and individual liberty. He declared himself in favor of universal suffrage and the direct election of the president. In his address, which was said to have occupied three hours, Carranza outlined the liberal reforms upon which the revolution was founded. On December 2, about thirty miles south of Chihuahua City, General Murguia met and defeated, in an engagement lasting six hours, a band of Villa followers who had pursued the retreating Carranza troops. The Villa forces, after loading two freight trains with loot, fled westward from Chihuahua City into their old strongholds, the city being reentered by Carranza troops on December 3.

Bombs Covered Theft. Detectives following up clues in New York City in connection with the disastrous munitions explosion at Archangel, found evidence that an organized gang of thieves was regularly replacing merchandise with bombs, the explosion of which, by destroying the package and contents, covered up the fact of the theft. It was stated that the Russian government alone had lost about $100,000 by wharf robberies in the last six months. There had been some inclination to blame the mysterious explosions occurring in shipments to the Allies upon sympathizers of the Teutonic powers.

Back to Literature. Dr. Henry Van Dyke, American minister to the Netherlands, announced his resignation on December 4, giving as his main reason his wish to return to his work as a writer with full freedom to say what he thought and felt. President Wilson has appointed as his successor Mr. John W. Garrett of Baltimore, former minister to Argentina, and secretary of the legation at The Hague in 1901. Mr. Garrett is a Republican.

A Nation-wide Food Inquiry. It was announced on December 6 that the Federal investigation of the high cost of living would be one of the most comprehensive ever undertaken.

A Presbyterian Pioneer. The old First Presbyterian Church of New York, established in 1716 in Wall Street and for one hundred years known as the Presbyterian Church of Wall Street, held its 200th anniversary on Sunday, December 3. The church had its inception in furtive meetings held in private houses, but the dissenters were finally given permission to meet in the old city hall at Wall and Nassau Streets, meeting there until 1719, when their first church building was completed on Wall Street on a site part of which is now occupied by the Bankers' Trust Company. The church decided to move up town in 1844, and it then acquired the block front on Fifth Avenue between Eleventh and Twelfth Streets on which the present building was erected. December 3 was also the Rev. Howard Duffield's twenty-fifth anniversary as pastor of the church.

Bryan Urges National Prohibition. At a dinner given in his honor in Washington on December 6, Mr. Bryan declared that the Democratic party was the party of the people, that the home was the citadel, and that the fight against the saloon is a fight for the home and for humanity. He declared that the Democratic party therefore could not hesitate to choose the home against the greatest enemy that has arisen to menace it. Mr. Bryan also expressed his disapproval of the proposal that the nation should take over exclusive control of the railroads, taking the position that because the railways wanted it, it must therefore be in their interests and against the interests of the states. He opposed universal military service, advocated popular election of the President and making the Constitution more easily amendable.

The action was taken, according to the president, because the railway system is enjoying an abnormal prosperity which has been produced by the same factors which have increased the cost of living. On the same day, the announcement was made that the Western Union Telegraph Company would pay a bonus of six per cent. on a year's salary to all employees earning $2,000 a year or less. . . . George C. Boldt, since 1893 proprietor of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, and probably the best-known hotel man in the country, died December 5.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE past week has been in many ways one of the most eventful of the war. In Great Britain on December 2 Mr. Asquith announced that with a view to the most effective prosecution of the war he had decided to advise the King to consent to the reconstruction of the government. The following Monday morning the Manchester Guardian, the most sober-minded and the leading English provincial newspaper, thus expressed itself editorially:

> There are, in fact, two crises; for the crisis in the ministry is but a reflection of the crisis of the war. The crisis in the war amounts to this: That the progress of events and succession of bitter experiences have at last brought home to the minds of most men the fact that we are not winning the war, and the further conviction that with the present methods of waging the war we shall never win it.

while the London John Bull, a weekly of wide circulation, printed an open letter from a well-known member of Parliament, of which the following is an extract:

> This fact we must bear in mind. If Asquith continues as premier for one more year the Germans and not we will dictate the peace terms. At the present rate of loss in ships it will not be long before England will be incapacitated to serve as the chief support of the Allies. The Germans know this and are hastening in making gigantic efforts to paralyze our shipping. Our losses are multiplying, are multiplying at a terrific pace, and a catastrophe is unavoidable unless we, regardless of neutrals, arm our merchantmen. Everything is at stake.

On Saturday evening Lord Beresford and Thomas Bowles, noted naval authority, spoke at a large public meeting of protest in London. Lord Beresford was the milder of the two. He said:

> The crisis of the war is now. The [submarine] menace requires new strategy and new tactics to deal with it, but so far no definite and systematic methods have been taken for suppressing the menace. It is a most unsatisfactory state of affairs. Thousands of tons of food which were waiting to come to England have been diverted to Germany.

Bowles was more virulent. After demanding new men and a new mind at the Admiralty, he went on:

> Unless this submarine menace is dealt with we shall be blockaded as well as Germany, and privation and famine prices will ensue. I see no glimmer of an overture of peace, but if overtures for an honorable peace should come, with sufficient guarantees, it will be the duty of the government to accept them. I have arrived at the conclusion, however, that this government is no more able to make peace than it is to make war.

These excerpts are given to explain the condition of affairs which produced the event next narrated. On December 5 Mr. Asquith saw the King and resigned his office of Prime Minister, the whole British cabinet resigning with him. The same day the King, in accordance with Mr. Asquith's recommendation, sent for Mr. Bonar Law and offered him the premiership, which that gentleman declined the following day. This office was in accordance with the custom of offering the post to the leader of the party opposing a retiring government. The King then sent for Mr. David Lloyd George and tendered him the offer, which he accepted in cooperation with Mr. Bonar Law. In view of the state of war, it is desired to avoid a general election, the course usual in case of the resignation of a ministry.

It was announced on December 8 that Lloyd George has apparently succeeded in forming a Cabinet on broad national lines, taking in prominent business men as well as political leaders. It had been predicted that the Labor Party would refuse its support to the new government, but it is now stated that that party will be represented in two ministerial posts and three under-Secretaryships. The general expectation is that the new Cabinet will be irrevocably committed to a strenuous prosecution of the war to a finish. One of the striking features of the situation is the prominent place that Lord Northcliffe, through his paper, The Times, has taken in bringing about this change in the government through attacks upon former Premier Asquith because of the unsatisfactory situation that Britain occupies in the campaign of the Allies. It was expected that Lord Northcliffe would enter the new Cabinet, but this he has publicly declared he will not do.

On Friday, December 1, Admiral Jellicoe was relieved of command of the British grand fleet and made First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, Vice-Admiral Beatty, who commanded the British battle cruiser squadron in the Jutland fight last May, and who married a daughter of Marshall Field of Chicago, succeeding him as commander of the Grand Fleet. Various deductions will probably be drawn from this change, but the most reasonable explanation seems to be that after two years of such great responsibility Admiral Jellicoe desired a less arduous post.

Great Britain announced at the beginning of this week, through the embassy at Washington, that she would be unable hereafter to guarantee bunker coal to any vessel not utilizing it "in such a way that British or Allied interests are benefited." In this policy, hard as it will press on our hopes of building up a large trade with South America, or carrying on our existing trade with the Philippines, Great Britain is absolutely within her rights, legal and moral. We shall merely reap the natural harvest of years of neglect of a most vital interest, our mercantile shipping and the necessary coaling ports therefor.

Turning to France, we find also evidences of extreme unrest and great dissatisfaction with the present condition of affairs and the present management of the war. In a long article in the Petit Journal, the Paris paper with the largest circulation of any newspaper in the world, the writer, speaking of Germany, says:

> She has understood that she could not overcome the number and power of effectives except by an industrial preparation superior to our own; by a quantity of artillery and ammunition which could dominate our artillery; by a supreme command which would leave nothing to the chance of improvisation; which would follow strictly laid down strategic lines; which would make a point of striking blows at the weakest points; which would not persist obstinately in local offensives without real strategic value and possible decisiveness. She has not hesitated to replace those leaders—some of them among the highest in rank—whose plans did not succeed.

The article concludes:

> And we? What do we want? What have we done? What are we doing?

"We talk, Germany acts," declared one French statesman.

As the result of a prolonged secret session of the French Chamber of Deputies, the approaching retirement of General Joffre from active command and the appointment of either Nivelle, Foch, or de Castlenau in his stead, is confidently expected. General Haig is also probably to be superseded.

The Russian interior situation is also very stormy. The Duma, the Russian parliament, is making a strong stand in opposition to the government for a complete reform of the Russian administration, civil and military, and apparently with some chances of success; but the censorship is so strict that complete news does not come to us.

ON the Austro-Italian front during the past week there have been no events of interest or importance, and practically no infantry fighting whatever. The only activity was by the artillery and the airmen.

The western front was eventless during the week. There were only occasional trench raids here and there, and some artillery duels both north and south of the Somme on the Picardy front, and also on the north front of Verdun. On the east front of Verdun the Germans made, late in the week, a very short-lived attempt to assume the offensive in the region to the east of Dead Man's Hill.

The German Admiralty announced that the French 800-ton transport Karnak, laden with troops destined for Salonica, was torpedoed near Malta on November 27 by a German submarine.

The Germans have defeated the Portuguese in southeastern German East Africa, near the border of Portuguese East Africa, and compelled them to retreat to their own territory.

On the Macedonian front there has been at intervals during the past week hard fighting to the north of Monastir, the Serbians attacking the Bulgarian positions repeatedly. The net result, however, was not very important. In the east of the Cerna River the Serbians did gain considerable ground after overcoming a strenuous Bulgar-German resistance. The Serbians are certainly fighting most gallantly. In the center on the Vardar River the British made small gains on the left bank.

Greece itself was the center of a rather violent storm during the week. The Greek government, as will be remembered, had flatly refused the demand made by the Allies to surrender the military supplies belonging to its army. On December 1, the Allies landed troops at Piræus, the port of Athens, some of whom proceeded to Athens to enforce this demand. Fighting between these troops, who were aided by the adherents of Venizelos, and the Greek troops, the reservists and the Athenian population immediately broke out and continued for several hours. Finally the Dutch minister interposed, and through his mediation an arrangement was effected whereby the Greek government surrendered one battery of mountain guns, and the Allies abandoned their demand for the rest of the artillery, withdrew their troops from Athens, and removed their representatives from control of the Greek postoffice and telegraphs.

The Russian front in Europe was very quiet all the week, except in the wooded Carpathians in southwestern Bukowina, the extreme end of this battle line proper.

In Rumania the Teutons moved steadily forward all the week. On November 29 the capture of Pitesci placed their northern army at a distance of about sixty-five miles to the northwest of Bucharest, and also placed their army in possession of the southern terminal of the line of railway running north to Campulung, thus cutting off the Rumanian forces operating there. Campulung capitulated the next day and its fall cleared the whole line through the Torzburg pass from the Transylvania frontier to Pitesci. A further advance to the east followed, and early in the present week the whole of northern Wallachia was in their possession. This army then began to move to the south, with the result that on the morning of December 5, the four Austro-German armies invading Rumania, one coming from Craiova and the west, one from the northwest along the Arges River, one from the north through Campulung, and the fourth from the Danube, met and fused in the central plain of Rumania to the northwest and southwest of Bucharest.

Targovista, between Pitesci and Ploesci, was captured, and the Rumanians were driven back to the Arges. South of Bucharest, after hard fighting, a heavy defeat was inflicted on the combined Russians and Rumanians, and the German cavalry succeeded in cutting the railroad between them and Bucharest. After this, events moved rapidly, it being simply a question of drawing in the slack of the noose around the capital. Finally, on December 7, a fourth Entente capital, Bucharest, followed Brussels, Belgrade and Cettinje into the possession of the Teutons, as did also the important railroad town of Ploesci, thirty-six miles north of Bucharest. The Rumanian armies which were defending Bucharest are reported to be in full retreat; more than 9,000 were captured. The event is hailed in Berlin as of the first importance, and the populace is reported to have received the news with great demonstrations.

Buzeu being once taken, the linking up of the Tuetonic forces operating to the west of the Danube with those of von Mackensen to the east of the Danube, reaching across the Dobrudja to the Black Sea, will mean a shortening of the Teutonic battle line to about 150 miles, and the resultant strengthening of the man and artillery power on each mile of front.

Without counting the prisoners taken in the capture of Bucharest and Ploesci in the Rumanian campaign, the Teutons had made over 75,000 Rumanian and Russian prisoners, besides capturing a large amount of munitions of war, about one-third of the Rumanian artillery, and an enormous amount of foodstuffs of all kinds, and had rendered themselves masters of the very productive Rumanian oil fields, which, if they hold them, will provide an abundance of oil for all civil and military purposes.

The French battleship Suffren, which left a French port on November 25, with a complement of 730 men, has been officially given up as lost. The Suffren took a prominent part in the attack upon Gallipoli, was seriously damaged and had only recently been repaired.

Secretary Lansing, on December 8, made public the American protest to Germany against the deportation of Belgians. The protest was made on the ground that the forcible deportation of Belgians for labor in Germany was in "contravention of all precedent and of those humane principles of international practice which have long been accepted and followed by civilized nations in their treatment of non-combatants in conquered territory." The German government was also informed that the policy if pursued would probably be fatal to Belgian relief work.

Following the decision of the Allied Governments to withdraw their proposed issue of treasury notes, it was announced that Allied buying in America had been noticeably curtailed and put on a gold basis.

Good Will Toward Men

FLORENCE TINSLEY COX

What Happened in This Story Last Week

INTO the home of Miss Camilla Wick and her brother, both along in years, entered on a wintry night a Mrs. Fisher, the woman who had robbed Miss Wick of her one and rather belated lover. He had since died, leaving his widow with a family of children, whom she had now brought back to the home town, hoping to make a living for them by sewing. When Miss Wick recognizes her caller and learns of her condition, her heart is hardened, particularly because she learns that her short-time lover (who had wooed her briefly when she was thirty-five years of age) died from the effects of drink. She lets her unfortunate rival depart without any comforting words, and to her brother's gentle reminder afterward that Christmas is only two weeks away, rejoins, bitterly, "That woman ruined my life."

THE James farm lay at the outskirts of the village. It was a poor, run-down place that had never been productive in its best days, and under a succession of shiftless tenants had gone steadily downward. The shingle roof on the old house was black and decayed, and inside the rain had covered the ceilings with stains. There was a smell of must through the house, and families of black spiders lived in every corner, from which they made little trips back and forth, or swung by aerial cables to the mantelpiece. The cellar was full of rats, and the last tenant had moved out in a moment of panic caused by the discovery of bats in the attic. She had stood rats and mold and spiders; but bats had finished her, she told the neighbors. Now the owner had come to live there, and everyone predicted a better state of affairs.

"It's a family of four," old Mrs. Geoffrey announced. "A woman and three little girls. I saw them through my spy-glass git off the twelve-forty-five on Wednesday. A queer time to move, ain't it? They hired Jefferson's two-seated sleigh and big Bob drove them out to the house himself. Afterwards he hauled their things. Nothing elegant at all. Two of the girls are fair; but the big one is dark. She had words with Bob about a chair. The woman wore widder's weeds. They tell me it's Mrs. Statira Fisher. He died and left her hardly nothing, so she's come home to her pa's farm. Didn't she used to sing in the choir when she was a little fair-haired girl? And didn't she marry the same man Camilla Wick gave the mitten to? What? I thought so."

Later in the week she had further communications to make.

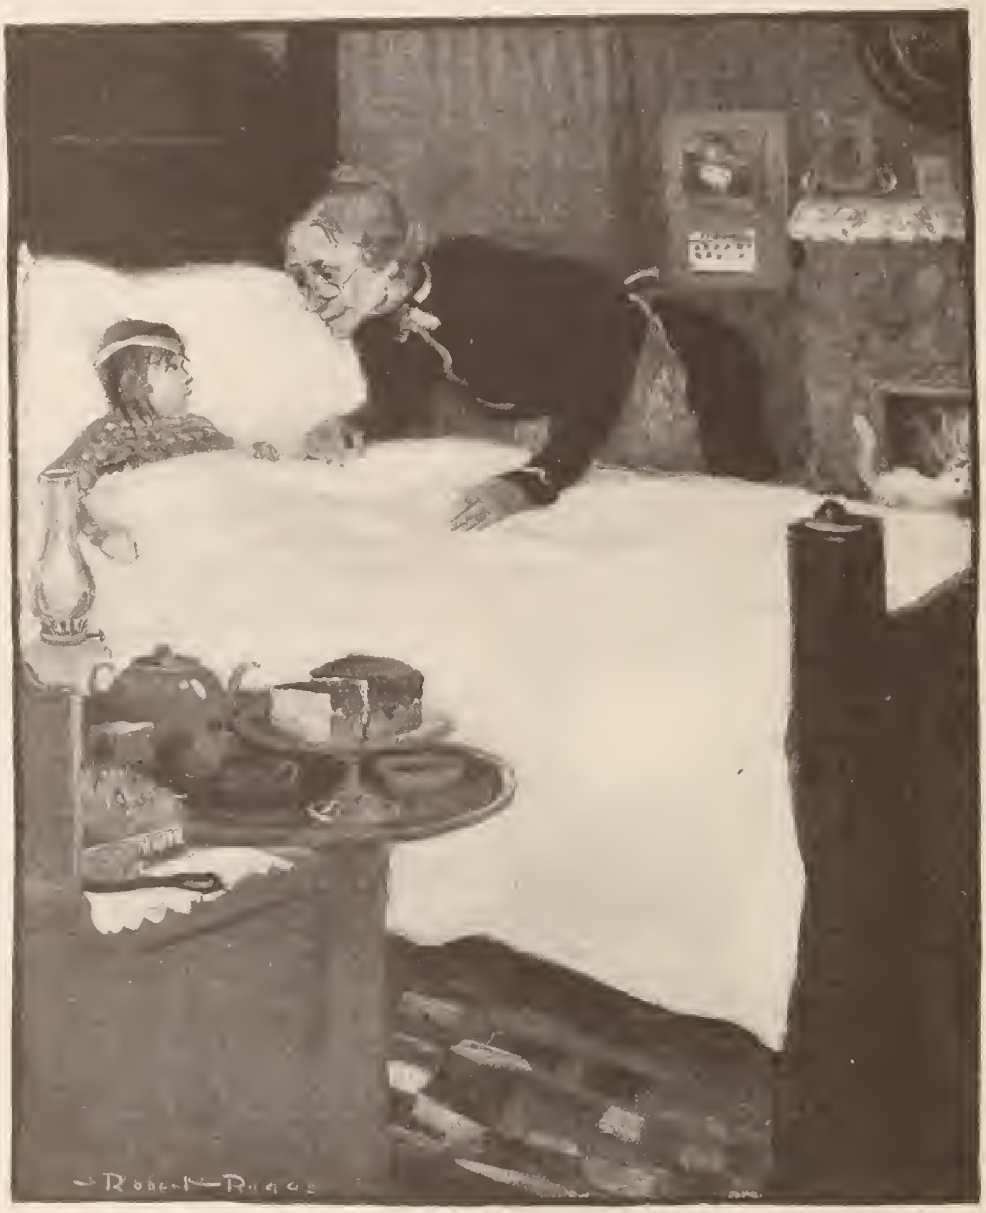
"They're awful quiet up to the James place. The big girl cleaned the snow off the shed roof yesterday. The baker stopped to the door, but they didn't git nothin'. The butcher stopped, too, but they only jawed at him. Jefferson sent out a small load of coal and what looked like a bag of flour. I expect they're goin' to make their own bread. I guess they must git their milk to the village. The big girl went to Wicks with a pail, and Camilla talked to her from the upper window. I guess she don't want to sell milk. If I had a big farm and them folks were near by, sort of poor and struggling, and related to my old sweetheart, I'd give them milk. Yes, I would. The Geoffreys were always liberal. No, I don't s'pose it's done us much good, but after all we ain't livin' only for this world. What say? Yes, I took my medicine. I knew you'd forget. Well, it ain't such an important moment for you as it is for me. Medicine is my only recreation. Did you know it was only ten days to Christmas now? Don't time run away! Mrs. Judge Homer's been clean to Boston to buy her presents. I saw her come back by the two-eighteen yesterday. I wonder what she's a-goin' to give me? Ain't she kind, though? Always remembers me same as if I was her own, and sends me picture postals when she's away. That blue one on the bureau is a skyscraper in New York. Some kind of a smoothing iron they call it. Must have been short on names when it was built. I wonder what Mrs. Judge Homer will think about the Fishers comin' back? Not time for my medicine again? My land!"

CAMILLA WICK was not as far-sighted as Mrs. Geoffrey, for she did not own a spy-glass, nor did she wish to see anything of her new neighbors. The day that the eldest girl came to ask for some milk it had been a pleasure to refuse the request.

"I don't sell milk," Camilla Wick said, looking down from her window at the little face below.

The child had looked up at her wistfully and then turned away with rapid steps. It had given Miss Camilla a queer pang at the heart to notice how much she resembled her father. She was very small for eleven years old, Miss Camilla thought, and yet she was the big eldest sister, the one who did everything. She had holes in her shoes and no rubbers on, and her skirt looked very scanty in the cold wind.

Little Camilla ran away without a backward glance. She went straight as a bird flies to the old James farm. When she came within sight of the house, however, her speed slackened. She went slower and slower, until finally when she reached the side door she stopped altogether. As she hesitated the door opened, and two little girls came out in a rush.



A white faced woman hovered near, and delicious smells floated about

"Milla, Milla, did you get it?" the first one cried.

"Baby's hungry," the other whimpered.

Camilla regarded them with a motherly air.

"There, there, run in the house," she said, driving the little fair things before her. "You'll get cold. Didn't sister tell you to stay in the house? You must mind sister."

She said it in a tone that signified that sister was a very wonderful and superior person in that family, and it was evident that they fully agreed with her estimate of herself, for they went meekly back into the kitchen. Within the house another voice called.

"Milla! Milla!" it said, feebly.

Little Camilla put down her pail on the kitchen table and went slowly into an adjoining room. It had been a sitting-room once; but now in an attempt to economize warmth it had become a bedroom. Mrs. Fisher was in bed there, looking very pale and somewhat frightened.

"Did you get the milk, Milla?" she asked, anxiously.

"Yes, ma'am," Camilla replied.

"Really?" her mother exclaimed, in glad surprise.

"Yes, ma'am," Camilla returned, stoutly.

"What did she say?" her mother questioned.

She raised herself on the pillow in an eager fashion.

"She put her head out of the window, quite smiling, and she said, 'Little Camilla, I'm glad to see you. I've heard of you.'"

"So she had!" Mrs. Fisher interpolated in a pleased way.

"Then I asked her politely if I could buy some milk. 'You can have all the milk you want,' she said. 'For nothing.'"

"What?"

"Yes, ma'am. For nothing."

"You had five cents," Mrs. Fisher said, faintly. "Why didn't you pay for it?"

"She said, 'Keep your five cents, little Camilla, to buy sugar.'"

"Why sugar?" the woman asked, in astonishment.

"Because we need sugar."

"But how did Miss Wick know we needed sugar?" her mother inquired.

Little Camilla shook her head.

"You didn't tell her?" her mother quavered. "You didn't tell her, Milla, dear, that it was the very last five cents?"

"No, ma'am! No, ma'am!"

"Well, it's awfully kind of her," Mrs. Fisher said, sinking back on her pillow. "I wouldn't hardly have believed it of Camilla Wick. She always seemed hardhearted. But she was very, very fond of your poor pa. I suppose that counts. Just as soon as I'm strong enough I'll get work to do. It's the moving that's played me out. Everything will be all right. It's sure to be."

"Sure to be!" the child repeated, promptly.

She turned away, hastening her steps at a sound of sobbing in the kitchen, but she did not forget to shut the door behind her.

"Sssh!" she said, one finger raised in alarm.

In the kitchen there were two babies crying over an empty pail.

"There ain't any milk, Milla!" one complained.

"Baby wants her milk!" the other wailed.

She gathered them to her with a half sob.

"Sister'll go get the milk," she said, "but while she's gone you mustn't bother mamma. Mamma's sick. Poor mamma."

"Poor mamma!" the two said in a chorus.

"And by and by," Camilla went on, swallowing the lump in her throat, "it's going to be Christmas. In a week. And Santa Claus will come down that big chimney. It's a nicer chimney than we had in the city. He'll bring stacks of presents, all the big things he couldn't bring us before."

"Baby's dolly?" the smaller one questioned.

"Sure!" Camilla promised.

"Will he bring some candy, Milla?" the other asked.

"A gum-drop tree!" Camilla declared. "Oh, won't it be fine!"

They stood smiling at the window to watch her go out again, her empty pail in her hand, her desperate little face turned on the world.

IT was a cold, dark, wintry afternoon. There was a pallid sunset off in the west, and a heavy bank of snow-clouds hung lowering over the village. It was getting toward dusk when Camilla neared the Wick farm. This time she didn't go near the house, but went creeping cautiously along the fence until she reached the barn. She opened the first door she came to and slipped into the dark interior. It was a long building, the horses on one side, the cows on the other. One cow was down on her knees, looking very much as if she was saying her prayers. She had a mild, benevolent expression that attracted little Camilla.

Letters from Santa Claus

Dictated to LEWIS ALLEN

r. Curt Bachelor,
Stagg Apartments, City.

DEAR SIR: I have read your letter—now, do not st this aside and growl "Rubbish!" or "What effronry!" Of course you did not write to me. The tter I read was the one you sent to your newspaper id which was published with letters from other eople. I recognized it, although you did not sign our right name. I will quote a part of it:

"There would be less suffering and want if we would o away with the frivolous spending of money for hristmas gifts and entertainments and such exavagances. In fact, we could abolish Christmas ery well."

I know you wrote that, Mr. Curt Bachelor, and I ant to tell you a little story. Once upon a time ere was a dear sweet mother whose husband died nd left her only a baby boy and a big indebtedness o pay. This woman went to work. She paid that idebtedness, she clothed and fed and educated that oy. Many a dinner-time she ate nothing because ere was only enough for one, but the boy never ent without a dinner, and when he grew up and was ble to make a good fortune because his mother acrificed every ounce of strength in paying for his ducation, she went on the Long Journey; but she eft him a memory of a devoted Christian mother ho never allowed a Christmas to pass but there as something in his stocking, something on a little ree. She worked long weary midnight hours to save or these Christmas presents.

That's the story. And I am going to give you a resent this year. It is rather a queer present, ecause you once owned it; but you lost it long, long go. That present is your Memory!

Don't you understand now? That boy's name vas Curtis Bachelor.

Well, Curt, you can't take back that letter of pessinism to the newspaper, but you can write a lot of ptimistic ones to counteract it; and perhaps you an find some struggling widowed mothers and help hem.

Sincerely,
SANTA CLAUS.

To The Hon. Rodney H. Fortune, Easy Street, City.

SIR: I trust you will pardon me, but I looked over your shoulder as you jotted down your Christmas ist. I was interested in the diamond necklace for your wife and the yacht for your son and the limousine for your daughter. I was also interested to note that you had sent expensive gifts to all of your own and your wife's relatives, who have great quantities of money themselves and always reciprocate each season.

It looks like a merry Christmas, but—and pardon me again—it will not be—to you. It even wearies you to think of these things to give, and it is a bore to sign so many checks, and the presents you get bore you.

Sorry, sir, but will you take a little advice from me? Or don't you care for a Merry Christmas? At any rate, I am going to take a chance of offending you and give you a tip.

There is in your city an organization which helps the deserving poor, another which gives toys and dinners to thousands of poor every Christmas, another which helps give crippled children free medical treatment and saves many from being permanently lame, another which educates the blind and makes them self supporting, and there are a great many other equally worthy organizations.

Why not send a check to some or all of these organizations?

How about the people who work on your country estate? Did you ever give them anything except money? Why not give them a human smile and handshake and let them know that they are real people, not mere automata? Why not give your house servants a little more time off for their own small but important holiday shopping? They had rather have an extra day than an extra five-spot.

Or don't you care anything about having a really and truly Merry Christmas? Yours, etc.,
SANTA CLAUS.

To Mamma,
Everywhere.

DEAR BLEST MAMMA: I see you have made up your Christmas list of what you are going to get for Tommie and Mary and Jack and Katie, and also your husband. Allow me to congratulate you. It is a splendid list, and shows excellent judgment.

But there, don't glow with too much pride right now. Allow me to add that it shows excellent judgment as far as it goes!

Yes, you have omitted several things from this list. Oh yes, they are important, too. Very important. I shall try and tell you some of the things you have overlooked.

For Tommie, a little more patience when he comes noisily into the house, and the ability to remember that you should give thanks that you have such a lusty, healthy, strong son.

For Mary, just a few more minutes now and then to help her gather the satin lining in dollie's bonnet. She doesn't quite know how to gather nicely, but if you show her, who knows but she will always remember and stop and help her own little girl do the same thing some day? Or perhaps it is something else, but it all means the same.

For Jack, a little less scolding when he wets his feet. Did you know that there are a great many little boys who are not straight enough or strong enough even to go out of doors, to say nothing of prancing about in a stray mud-puddle now and then, playing side-wheel steamboat.

For Katie, a few more bright hair-ribbons and permission to wear her hair "like the other girls," and be glad you have a normal little growing daughter who is so womanly a descendant of Mother Eve that she desires to be attractive.

For husband, one hearty, sincere kiss, together with one genuine welcoming smile and a number of bright cheerful words, all in one lot. Give them to him when he returns from work on Christmas Eve, and thereafter for the next three hundred and sixty-four nights, and repeat each Christmas Eve.

I know you merely overlooked these things, and that you will be grateful to me for suggesting that you add them to your list; for most all mammas are such dear creatures at heart, only sometimes three or four children sort of make them forgetful of the little but not unimportant things. With best love,
SANTA CLAUS.

The Little Preacher

By Mary Cochrane Endsley

HE was a wee youngster, a few months past three,
But a wonderful sermon he preached once to me.
He wanted for Christmas a kite and a swing,
And real little street-cars that run with a spring;
A drum and an air-gun, a Teddy-bear too,
A sled and a jack-box, an airship that flew.
Then he said: "Guess 'at's 'nough, fer 'tause I tan't fink
Of anyfing more but a paint-box an' ink!"

When I thought of the playthings for which he had asked
My heart sank so low as the windows I passed.
I had looked until now it was near closing time,
So I walked in a toy-shop and spent my last dime
For a bunch of tin soldiers. Just one had a drum,
Another a flag. And I took the toy home,
Expecting, next morning, to see him in tears.
He jumped out of bed while my throat choked with fears,
And ran to his stocking and cried with a shout:
"Oo, Santa has brunged me the fings I left out!"

NOW when I kneel in my own supplication
To ask many favors, all trembling with doubt,
There comes unto me this quaint revelation,
"The best that God gives us, in prayer we leave out!"
My head droops the lower and I murmur then:
"Lord, give me whatever thou choosest! Amen!"

To Papa,
Everywhere.

VERY DEAR AND IMPORTANT PAPA:

Greetings. Do you remember the days when you wrote notes to me? Sometimes you got many of the things you asked for, didn't you? And your faith in me was great. Sometimes you didn't get a thing you asked for, because other powers thought they knew better in all their wisdom of years than you yourself knew what your little heart yearned for, and you almost lost faith in me and the story of Christmas and the whole world, didn't you?

I have had a look at the list of things you are getting for the children, and I have seen their notes to me, of course. Now, I am not going to be sarcastic about it at all; but, honestly, do you think you know best what your little boys and girls want most, right down in their little hearts?

And for your wife? I couldn't see anything on your list of things for her about "More interest in her home affairs," "More pride in her wonderful motherhood," "More kind words for her, regardless of how you feel," "More praise for her, knowing that no good Mother ever got half the praise she deserved."

Well, Mr. Papa, you are a bright chap, as average papas are, so I trust you will take the hints I have outlined.

Here's to a successful Christmas. SANTA.

Master Willie Poore,
Narrow Street, City.

MY DEAR WILLIE:

GREETINGS: I got your note all right and was able to read it, even though you did scrawl it so hastily on the rather smelly paper that came around the herrings your mother bought for your Sunday dinner.

Now, Willie, you have asked for quite a number of things that you may not get. One cannot always have everything he picks out, can he? But you have been a pretty good boy, and I am going to make it all up to you some way. Aside from a few little toys that you will find on Christmas morning, I am going to give you something the richest men in the world would give fortunes to own: that is, a good appetite!

And I am going to give you good health, and this will enable you to digest everything you eat and grow tall and big and strong. And I am going to give you the plainest of food for a while. You may think you prefer rich things, but when you get older you will find that plain food and a perfect appetite are the best possible presents. They will give you a clear brain and good blood, and enable you to learn rapidly, think clearly and become a smart, capable and successful man.

Of course it wouldn't do for me to tell you all about what I am going to give you, but I tell you this so you will understand why you do not get much else this year. Suppose you give a lot of presents to make up for it? Give your father a little help by hunting up boxes and other kindlings; give your mother a little rest by getting up early and getting father's breakfast so she can have another hour's sleep. Tell them these are Christmas presents which you intend to string right along through the year. I know you will do it because you are a good boy.

Santa Claus has his unhappy moments, Willie, when he cannot give to the deserving half the things he would like to give. This is one of my unhappy moments, but you will have some very happy Christmas holidays in the years to come.

Very affectionately,
SANTA CLAUS.

Miss Viola Riche,
Van Gilt Avenue, City.

DEAR MISS RICHE: Your highly perfumed letter at hand. Did you know that chemists and druggists very frequently put perfume in things to disguise their unpleasantness? A sweet smile is better than ten thousand sweet odors. But as to your wants:

I have no doubt but you will get the pearl ring and the enameled watch and the automobile and all the other things, because you have always got what you wanted. I wish you could get some really worthwhile presents, Viola; some things you need. I wish I could do these up for you, and put the labels on them. They would read: "One pleasant disposition," "One lot unselfishness," "One knack of smiling instead of pouting," "One constant fondness for healthy things to eat," and a great many similar things.

Unfortunately I cannot send these to you now. But if at any time you show a genuine desire for them, do you know they will be yours? And by the way, don't forget there are a lot of poor little girls over in that Orphans' Home on the other side of the park who never owned a really truly doll. You have thirty-eight in your playroom, and you never play with any of them. Of course this is only a hint.

Good-by,
SANTA CLAUS.

Miss Susie Poore,
Narrow Street, City.

MY VERY DEAR SUSIE: Yours is indeed a charming note. All you ask is a rubber ball and picture book for baby brother, and a doll and a little broom for yourself, and you want the broom to help mother sweep.

It is very likely, very likely, that you will get these; you shall get the doll, I feel quite sure; and if your father is too busy to bring it home for you where I leave it, some one who reads this will no doubt see that you get the doll.

Every Christmas you are getting a present or two that you know nothing about. You are getting health and bright eyes and a pretty face and a clean mind, and I am sure that when you get older this will prove the very best present any little girl could have. With lots of love.
SANTA CLAUS.

An Open Letter,
To Everybody, Everywhere.

MY DEAR FOLKS:—The price of a real Christmas is strict obedience to the true Christmas spirit. Don't think Christmas is an especial one of the 365 days. Rather try and regard the other 364 days in the light of Christmas. Don't think that because Christmas is a holiday all you have to do is skate or coast or play games or sit and eat. Go to church! A lot of people really forget the true meaning of the day.

Just add to your list of Christmas gifts Good Cheer, Grins, Joy, Patience, Forgiveness, Hope, Help, Charity, Encouragement, Praise and Prayer. Your list will not be complete without these.

Well, Dear Everybody of Everywhere, please take my letter in its true Christmas spirit, and accept my wishes that you may have a Worthy and Helpful as well as a Merry Christmas.

Yours as ever,
SANTA CLAUS.

"God's Purpose in the War"

SO clearly and forcefully does the following letter express a state of public opinion that it calls for full presentation and extended consideration:

EDITOR of the Christian Herald:—From time to time the prayers of Christian people throughout the world have been sent up to end the great world war now going on. The President of the United States has on at least two occasions set apart special days for prayer. Its end has been a frequent object of solicitation in Protestant pulpits, while the Pope on several occasions has urged Catholics throughout the world to pray earnestly for its cessation. The Central Powers have recently let it be known that a large majority of the people are tired of the war and are longing and praying for peace. And yet the great world war goes on apace, with not as much prospect of ending now as two years ago when it commenced.

What then? Do the prayers of Christians avail nothing? Evidently so, in this greatest of world crises. What is the reason? Let us rather ask, has the right kind of prayer been made? And has God an object and purpose concerning this war? Undoubtedly he has. While the war was brought on by man, and Christianity can in no way be held accountable for it, there is no question that God has a purpose concerning it and will bring results from it little thought of at its inception. Such has been the case with other great wars The American Revolution had no other object and purpose at first than the resistance of an unjust tax. But it finally ended in the establishment of a new democracy and political equality for the people.

The American Civil War, the greatest war in the history of the world up to that time, ended in far-reaching results not expected at its beginning. And there is no question but that God had a purpose concerning the Civil War different from that of the people and not realized by them at first. For it is a well-known fact that Lincoln thought the war would last only sixty days, and his sole object at first was to preserve the Union and bring back the seceding states. He had no thought, at first, of taking so drastic a step as freeing the slaves. And it was not until a critical period of the war, in September, 1862, that Lincoln began to realize the purpose of God in the war, and promised God that if the Union forces were victorious at Antietam he would issue an emancipation proclamation. The Union forces were successful, the proclamation was issued, the final one January 1, 1863, and thenceforth the tide of war ran in favor of the North, until the freedom of the slaves became an actual fact by the surrender of Lee.

There were doubtless many prayers sent up by Christians at the time to end the Civil War. No one was more desirous and strove more earnestly for an early end than Lincoln himself, to whom war was abhorrent and who had the burden of this great conflict upon his soul. But had this war ended at any time before God's purpose concerning it had been accomplished it would have been a world calamity worse than the war itself.

The prayer, then, of the Christian concerning the present war should not be that it may end, but rather that God's purpose concerning it may be accomplished. What is the purpose of God concerning the present war? And is it possible for man to ascertain this purpose? God works through the instrumentality of man, and therefore man must be able to ascertain his purpose. Otherwise, God could not accomplish his purposes. Let us endeavor, then, to ascertain God's purpose concerning this war.

AS above stated, this war is the act of man, and Christianity is in no way accountable for it. On the other hand, can it not be said that this very war was prophesied by Jesus in his famous prophecy of nation rising against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, with famines and earthquakes in divers places? This is a point touched upon very little in the pulpit or in the Christian press, and appears to be a question tabooed by the leading Christian writers concerning the war.

Jesus was speaking of what were to be the signs of the end of the world, or, as many prefer to translate, the end of the present age, and the inauguration of a new age, or era. Did Jesus know what he was talking about? Was he speaking idle and meaningless words? Or did he know what the world would have to go through before it could enter upon the new era of peace, righteousness and social justice he was describing? No true Christian can admit for a moment that these were idle words. It must also be acknowledged that this prophecy had not been fulfilled up to the present war, and that at no time in the history of the world have the words been so applicable as at the present. Still further, there are very few who look forward to still greater wars in the future, to a time coming when these words would be more applicable, of more nations rising against nations, and more kingdoms against kingdoms. On the contrary, most people are looking forward to peace, and the combatants claim they are fighting for lasting peace.

Be it far from us to impute to Jesus idle words. It should be remembered that he lived in a highly militaristic age. The supremacy of Rome throughout the world was based solely upon force of arms. Jesus may or may not have foreseen this particular present war. Whether he did or not, he doubtless had in mind the great truth that militarism is the way to destroy militarism, and that a great world war would have to take place before his kingdom or era of peace, in its fuller and larger sense, could be ushered in.

There is no doubt but that the experience of the Civil War is largely accountable for the pacific tendency in America today. One of the most successful Union generals said, "War is hell." If to the victor war is hell, to the defeated it must be worse than hell. In order to destroy militarism and the desire for war, only let there be enough of it. And the longer the war and the more nations engaged, the more complete its destruction and greater the assurance of universal and lasting peace.

We may look for, then, as one of the natural results of the war, a long lasting and, very likely, permanent peace. Would this be God's purpose concerning this war? Undoubtedly so. But only one of his purposes. There will also be a deepening and quickening of the spiritual life of the people. This is already taking place in the countries at war and doubtless will be intensified and increased before it is over.

BUT God has still another purpose, for the new era to be ushered in is to be one of peace, righteousness and social justice. Jesus has so described it in his description of the kingdom of heaven which was to become fully established upon earth after a great world war. There is an economic as well as a spiritual side of the kingdom of heaven, as described by Jesus. The economic side has been very much neglected and ignored heretofore by the church, whose adherents have usurped a larger part of the wealth of the world.

The present war has awakened England to the fact that she has not done what she should for her common people. A practical system of state socialism has made the Germans an efficient people both from a commercial and military standpoint. And now England, who has neglected her common people so long, is thoroughly aroused, and promises great things for the lower classes. Many of her leading industries, because of the war, have become nationalized, and Lord Northcliffe predicts a system of state socialism by the end of the war. According to press despatches, Premier Asquith recently announced that a new social order would be put into effect in England. The conditions of the poorer classes would be greatly improved, poverty eliminated, and the British workingman paid the highest wages anywhere in the world. It was further stated that the government was working out a plan which would be put into effect after the war. Thus we see the inevitable drift in England at the present time toward a new social régime.

The purposes of God will not be realized until a new social order is put into effect, and one in harmony with the principles of Jesus set forth by him in his description of the kingdom of heaven. And just as the American Civil War did not end until after the purpose of God concerning it became an assured fact, so we believe the present war will not end before the purposes of God concerning it are first accomplished by the inauguration of a new, more beneficent and Christian social order.

Let the prayer of the Christian be, then, not that war may end, but that God's purposes concerning it be accomplished. And let the Christian be patient concerning the war, doing all he can meanwhile to alleviate the suffering arising from it. For are not great things to result from it?

THOMAS J. HUGHES.

IN the foregoing letter there are many things that we regard as excellent, although we cannot accept all of the writer's conclusions. We cannot believe that God's purpose in this war—which we regard as wholly due to national selfishness and the forgetfulness of the divine rulership—is of a character that would make the slaughter of millions of human beings a part of a great scheme of social regeneration.

We believe firmly that he can, and does, and will, make "the wrath of man to praise him." It is the divine prerogative to bring good out of evil. But to multiply or permit the multiplication of evil to a point at which all humanity shudders, saints and sinners alike, cannot be characteristic of the divine beneficence.

If the present war may be justified on the grounds above set forth, then all wars, and indeed all evils, may alike be made to seem justified. A large school of philosophy plausibly contends that poverty and privation, for example, are beneficently placed in the world to teach us industry and providence. Even by this reasoning, these evils serve their purpose only in their eradication. If any good purpose is served by any evil it is served only in the resistance aroused against it.

If war be indeed divinely inflicted to teach us its horrors and awaken us to wrongs that cry for correction, even then, should we not, as soon as possible, learn the lesson and apply quickened mind in place of killing armament to an adjustment of the wrongs? If it is divine design that at any cost God's people must be taught to serve his purpose, then, in his Name, let us help to hasten our serviceability.

AT this Christmas time, the whole world should be mindful of the fact that the message of the angels announcing the advent of the Saviour was a message of peace and goodwill. In all his teachings the Prince of Peace showed a divine abhorrence of war, and even in his predictions toward the close of his earthly ministry, foreshadowing the great wars to come, they were spoken of in sorrow, and as being the result of the world's own wickedness. This greatest of all wars, which the world's forgetfulness of God has brought upon itself, is purging the nations as with fire, and bringing the peoples of all lands on the knees before God in penitence and humiliation. In a the countries, combatant and neutral, prayers a ascending that God in his infinite mercy may open th eyes of the warring powers to the awful wickedness o the war, and that when it ends, he may bring lastin peace to pass. In our own land we join in thes petitions, yet not as rebelling against but submittin to the divine will, which has permitted war to con tinue thus far.

Now, there is evidence on every hand that the tim for mediation has come. After nearly two and a ha years of ceaseless slaughter, the gigantic struggl shows no signs of reaching a decisive result, and th nations are weary of the futile strife and desirous o peace. The cry for peace is today ascending i England, Germany, France, Italy and other land It would be a terrible and unthinkable form o Christianity that could sit patiently by and witnes the frightful tragedy and the world-wide sufferin without a feeling of intense sympathy, and withou crying to God in his wisdom to save Europe fro suicide.

The world has books in untold thousands fille with what we pretentiously call solutions of th mysteries of human nature and the purposes o Providence. This wisdom may seem very profoun to us. But in the inconceivably vast systems o worlds upon worlds and forces upon forces an mysteries upon mysteries that are utterly beyond u we are, but for the touch of the divine, as small an stupid and helpless as insects that are born at dusk t die at dawn.

Yet there is a direction in which we do know tha human powers grow in qualities that partake of th divine. The awful catastrophe of war, which show how small and helpless we are, must also make u forget for a while our selfish strivings and remin us that, after all, humankind is but a poor little famil in sore need of all the sympathy, understanding an aid that can be exchanged.

In the presence of a horror before which huma learning and power are helpless, human love an helpfulness loom up as the potent, abiding, uncon querable, irresistible forces of earth.

More important than all national boundaries, whic are so easily shifted; more precious than all property which is so easily destroyed; better than all huma wisdom, which is so easily confounded, is world-wid sympathy, the quality divine, which disaster onl strengthens and despair only sweetens, and which especially at Christmas time, should sweep across th earth like a host of angels out of heaven.

WE repeat, the time for mediation has come. I it the duty of our Christian nation, whic believes itself to be specially called to heal the wound and assuage the sorrows of war, to withhold its hand and stand back to watch the bloody slaughter to a finish? Is it not rather our imperative duty to put all other considerations aside and to take up the task of Peacemaker—a rôle which the Master himself especially blessed and commended as befitting his servants? It is not for us to judge but to pity and to extend succor, and to heal the wounds and provide for the great need, as did the Good Samaritan. At this Christmas season, above all others, we have surely, then, a right to pray for the misguided peoples of the Old World, that the time of their trials and sufferings may be shortened.

Those in peaceful America who know what is going on in Europe through the daily newspapers really learn little of the war beyond the movements of great armies, the demolition of cities, the capture of guns and prisoners, and the appalling toll taken by death in each encounter. But those of us who have come into closer contact with the war's results, through the labors of our twelve relief committees in the combatant countries, have learned what the conflict means to innumerable bereaved homes, and to the widows and orphans, counted by the hundreds of thousands, who are left helpless in a world overshadowed by barbarism and cruelty. These unfortunates are assuredly not of the opinion that God would regard our prayers for them as untimely, or that, at this Christmas season, it would be un-Christian to pray that God, in the name of that dear Saviour who came to earth on Christmas Day 2,000 years ago, would restore peace to the world.

We repeat, therefore, that we cannot find it in our hearts to urge the Christian people of America to cease praying for Europe's pacification and salvation. And we believe God will hear those prayers, and that the answer may be nearer even than we think. So we bow to his wisdom and still pray on.

THE Japanese in their customs and costumes are as queer to us as we are to them. Mr. Maynard Owen Williams is taking Christian Herald readers through this interesting land and into China and other parts of the Orient, and by pen and picture enables us to see these people at their occupations. These four pages of pictures give a foretaste of what is still ahead.

A Hero Dies

JOHN ("CUB") BREWER died in Des Moines, Iowa, the other day, amidst the universal mourning and praise of the people of his native city. His prominence in the ommunity did not grow out of wealth, r political position, or military achievenent; he had none of these. Through period of years he had saved the lives f twelve people from drowning. Some years ago the Iowa State Register had this account of an accident: "Three of them broke in and two got out with some difficulty, but the third, Bird Bliss, sank two or hree times and finally, to the unutterable horror of the bystanders, disappeared altogether. John Brewer, a young man who had already disinguished himself in rescuing drowning people, had the presence of mind and the courage to try to save Bliss. Hopeless as the task seemed. He kated to the edge of the hole and plunged into the icy water. The brave rescuer managed to reach him by diving and succeeded in dragging him out and bringing him to the urface of the open water where he held up the senseless body of Bliss by reading water until assistance arrived and both were got onto the olid ice." The Mail and Times said: 'Des Moines has a quiet, unostenatious boy who on last Wednesday performed an act of heroism of which he most gallant man in the United States might well be proud and will tamp John Brewer, who has not as yet attained his twenty-first birthday, the hero of the hour." For this act of heroism the citizens of Des Moines presented Brewer with a beautiful solid gold medal with public exercises attending the presenation, and the family of the boy he aved gave him a handsome gold watch. Cub Brewer was only the humble keeper of a public bath house, but he was loved as a hero. How often we find among the humblest and poorest of our people the most superb specimens of herosm, who imitate the example of the real Hero of all ages, of whom it was aid: "For the Son of man is come to eek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19 : 10.)

Sleeping Cars Go Astray

SLEEPING-CARS for three cities became mixed up at Harrisburg, Pa., the other day, and the passengers awoke to find themselves many miles from their destination. The Pittsburg-Wilkesbarre car was attached to a train for Philadelphia, and the Pittsburg-Philadelphia car was put on a train for Sunbury, while a Pittsburg-Washngton car was sent to Philadelphia. Rush orders were sent out, and the cars were sent speeding in the right direction on later trains. It makes all the difference in the world what road is taken to reach the desired destination. It is all-important to take the right road n the journey of life if the desired destination is to be reached. "Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." (Matt. 7 : 13.)

Panic Follows Lion's Escape

A TRAINED lioness escaped from her cage in a theater in Kansas City, Kan., and caused an audience of 300 persons to flee in panic. So great was the force of the frightened crowd as it rushed for safety that the front and sides of the building were pushed out and a score of persons were injured. By prompt action the trainer and several policemen got the animal back into her cage before any damage was done. There are lions breaking their cages in the physical, mental and moral realm, and threatening human life. They are the bestial appetites and fierce passions that destroy the individual and those around him. It is the business of the home, the school and the church to cage and tame these animal impulses, and prevent their interference with the high purposes of life. The panic of the crowd at the lion that had escaped calls to mind the lazy man who offered this fear as an excuse for his indolence: "The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets." (Prov. 22 : 13.)

Beautiful Swiss Charity

ACTING upon the suggestion of Mr. Gustave Ador, the able and ever active president of the International Committee of the Red Cross, and Mme. Hoffmann, wife of a member of the Federal Council, Switzerland has lately added another humane work to her already extensive field of charitable activities. More than three hundred Swiss hotels offered a gratuitous sojourn of from one to five weeks to more than two thousand French, English, Belgian, Italian, German and Austrian nurses who have since the outbreak of the war done such heroic work in the military hospitals. The accompanying photograph shows the arrival of a group of French nurses at the Geneva railroad station, where refreshments were served to them under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross. What a blessed charity—to give rest and relief to the nurses who have cooled the fever, soothed the wounds, and softened the dying pillow of the brave men torn so fearfully in battle! The surgeons and nurses are veritable angels of God, ministering to those whom the demon of war has so cruelly maimed. Constantine claimed to have seen a cross in the heavens with the inscription, "By this sign conquer!" It is the universal prayer of Christendom that the Christ of the Red Cross may conquer the god of war, and give Europe and the world a just and lasting peace, his rule of universal love. Whoever else may rule, Christ is the real King of the wide world as well as of the Jews. "Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews." (John 19 : 19.)

Temperance Suggestions

AUGUST A. BUSCH, president and chief owner of the Anheuser-Busch Brewery Association, makes suggestions to check the tide of prohibition which is destroying the liquor traffic in this country. They are that the state authorities enforce the excise laws with great strictness, that the brewers aid the authorities in putting out of business any one who does not obey the very letter of the law, that all treating in saloons be forbidden, that all bars be abolished, and that only beer and light wines be sold, and then only to patrons seated at tables, according to the German custom. If prohibition forced his brewery to go out of business, Mr. Busch said that the $70,000,000 plant in St. Louis would be used for other manufacturing purposes. He suggested that it might be made over into a munition factory or the largest meat-packing concern in the world. Mr. Busch has cause for alarm. For while Missouri rejected prohibition on November 7, the whole state outside of St. Louis and St. Louis County voted dry, and some time the state legislature might take a notion to enact statutory prohibition. The great brewer knows that on election day the liquor business got the worst blow in its history, and that to the brewers or distillers themselves national prohibition seems among the probabilities in the not distant future. The proposition of reform by Mr. Busch has come too late. It is unpractical and impossible at the present time. Christ, who killed slavery and absolute despotism, seems to be destroying the liquor traffic. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." (I John 3 : 8.)

Bought $350,000 Library

AT a price said to be $350,000, Henry E. Huntington has bought the famous collection of Americana, which was the property of S. R. Christie-Miller of England. One book in the collection, valued at $15,000, is a volume of the laws of Massachusetts, collected from the records of the General Court and published in Cambridge in 1660. Only two copies are known and Mr. Huntington now has both. Another $15,000 book is "New Mexico; Otherwise the Voyage of Anthony of Espeio," published about 1587. It narrates the adventures of a Spanish explorer and describes fifteen provinces he visited, finding in some of the towns houses of four or five stories.

Another extremely rare book is a compilation of the laws of Virginia, 1612, by William Strachey. It is a presentation copy from the author to Thomas Lawson, "sometymes a personall confederat and adventurer." It is a good thing for millionaires to put some of their money into fine paintings and books. The scraping together of millions of dollars even in an honest way is a mockery unless it be spent for something better than money; for the things that belong to the realms of beauty, truth, and love. Books are necessary for mental equipment, and moral development, no matter how great the native ability may be. Paul, though a great genius, was an omnivorous reader. He needed a cloak for his body, books for his mind, and parchments for his soul. "The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." (II Tim. 4 : 13.)

Sat Down on Lid

BECAUSE Captain Thomas Condon sat down on the lid that covered the gasoline tank on the power yacht Anvirdo, anchored in New Rochelle harbor, when the boat was on fire, the yacht was saved from destruction. Seeing the boat afire, he ran to the tank and held the lid down till the firemen came and extinguished the flames. Meanwhile all of his clothes and belongings in the cabin were burned up. The captain displayed physical courage of a high order. What a splendid thing is physical courage, and moral courage, of which it is a type! Physical courage for a moral purpose is thus enjoined by a Jewish leader: "Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God." (II Sam. 10 : 12.)

Writer Warned by a Skull

A SHORT-STORY writer and newspaper man of Media, Pa., received by parcel post from San Francisco a human skull, which he believes to be a warning of impending danger sent by the Hip Sings, a Chinese tong. Graduating at Johns Hopkins University, he went into a newspaper office in Butte, Mont. He attempted to get a story of the underground life of Chinatown, and inadvertently walked into a meeting of Chinese gunmen in a deserted mine. To save his life he joined the tong. He was chosen to go to San Francisco and fight another tong. He deserted the Chinese that were with him and left that part of the country. For years he was hounded by members of the tong, who fired at him several times and wounded him with a poisoned dart, which held him in a New York hospital for a long time and permanently injured him. The man believes that in some way the tong discovered that he had been living in Media. and sent the skull with his tong name "Yet Sho" written across the forehead to remind him of what fate awaited him. It is a sad commentary on our American civilization that there should be a single band of gunmen in the country. The great agony of God's Son was at a place called "a skull." "And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull, they gave him vinegar to drink." (Matt. 27 : 33–34.)

Christmas Wishes

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE Poor Rich Girl lived in a brownstone mansion just off Fifth Avenue, and the Rich Poor Girl lived in a dingy brick tenement over by Avenue A. The Rich Poor Girl worked in a department store where she earned six dollars every week. The Poor Rich Girl never did a stroke of work and had gilt-edged securities thrown carelessly into her lap by way of compensation. Both girls were young, fairly pretty in widely different ways, and vividly alive. But there the likeness ended. For the Poor Rich Girl was bored at times, and tired of her overabundance of worldly goods, and unhappy, while the heart that beat joyously under the Rich Poor Girl's threadbare jacket was a happy heart.

The Rich Poor Girl and the Poor Rich Girl happened to meet, by chance, on Christmas Eve. If Coincidence had not dipped a finger into Fate's pie, they never would have met; for Fifth Avenue and Avenue A are very far from each other—and the distance is not measured in miles.

But Coincidence did intervene; and as the Poor Rich Girl, hurrying home from her belated Christmas shopping, swung her smart little car (the car that she drove all by herself) down a crowded side street, the Rich Poor Girl, seeing a rift in the stream of traffic, started to dart across the way. There was a muffled scream, a dull, horrid grinding of brakes, and the Poor Rich Girl, rather white and sick-looking, sprang out over the low door. Many gay packages, tied with holly and red ribbon, were shaken to the sidewalk.

The Rich Poor Girl lay in a heap almost under the car. Her eyes were closed, and one chapped little hand was clenched tightly on nothing at all. The Poor Rich Girl knelt at her side, oblivious of the crowd that was forming, and raised the head in its cheap velvet hat. "Oh!" she quavered; "is she dead?"

A burly traffic policeman elbowed his way through the crowd. He spoke threateningly to the Poor Rich Girl. "You reckless drivers," he growled, "you have a lot to answer for!"

A crowd will often side with wealth—particularly when wealth is well dressed and attractive. "The girl," some one volunteered, "threw herself right in front o' the car. It was her own fault!"

The Poor Rich Girl ignored both remarks. She seemed fascinated by the pale face of the girl she had run down. "Is—is she dead?" she half whispered.

As if in answer the Rich Poor Girl opened her eyes. "No," murmured the Rich Poor Girl, "I ain't dead! But I gotta hurt foot!" She made a weak little grimace.

All at once the Poor Rich Girl rose to her feet. "Some of you," she addressed the crowd impersonally, "help lift her into my car. I'll take her home with me, and get a doctor."

The policeman and a bystander lifted the rather limp body of the Rich Poor Girl into the car, there was a flurry of taking names, and the Poor Rich Girl touched the self-starter. The smart little car whirred, sprang forward. A small messenger boy sighed wistfully as he watched it go. "Some bus!" he murmured. The crowd drifted away.

PREPARATIONS for a dignified Christmas were being made in a brownstone mansion just off Fifth Avenue. There were lights springing up in the windows and the dignified butler was hanging holly wreaths in the doorways. A footman came hurriedly down the steps to open the door of the car. The Poor Rich Girl startled him by grasping his arm. "James" (why are all story footmen named James?), she said, "I've run over a girl. You must carry her into the house. Up to my room."

James lifted the Rich Poor Girl in his sturdy arms. She moaned a bit when he lifted her, for her foot was very sore indeed. He carried her up stairs. She was not hard to carry. Six dollars a week do not make one heavy. He laid her tenderly upon a soft bed. "And now," the Poor Rich Girl told him, "you had better send for a doctor." She rang nervously for her maid.

TWO hours later, her ankle in a bandage, the Rich Poor Girl told the Poor Rich Girl the story of her life. It was not a thrilling story. "My father an' my mother," she said, "died. I was a little kid. Soon as I was fourteen I went to work. I liked school. I wish I could've went longer to school. When I was eighteen I got a job in the store. I'm nineteen now. I get"—proudly—"six a week."

"My father," said the Poor Rich Girl, "and my mother are dead, too. I'm all alone. You get six . . . what?"

"Six dollars," the Rich Poor Girl told her. The Poor Rich Girl gasped.

"And you get along on that? she questioned. "And you're all alone?"

"All alone nothin'!" said the Rich Poor Girl, "there's Bill!"

"Bill?" The Poor Rich Girl was puzzled. "Bill?"

"My feller," the other told her. "He's a shippin' clerk in the store. Some day we'll be married. He's makin' twelve a week!"

"You love him?" questioned the Poor Rich Girl.

"You bet I do!" came the answer.

THERE was silence for a moment. The clock ticked brokenly. Then the Poor Rich Girl spoke.

"If," she said, "a very wonderful Santa Claus were to creep down the chimney tonight, a very wonderful Santa indeed, what would you ask for? Would you ask for money, or lovely dresses, or a house like this one? Would you ask to be me instead of yourself?"

The Rich Poor Girl raised herself gingerly on one elbow. "No," she answered at last. "I wouldn't ask t be you. I'm glad I'm me."

The Poor Rich Girl swallowed he surprise. "If," she said, "if I wer Santa Claus—if I offered you the educa tion that you wanted and couldn't go —if I offered you several years in schoo and a real start after you were out o school—what would you say?"

"I'm nineteen now," said the Ric Poor Girl, "an' I'd say, miss, that yo was five years too late. What'd Bi do if I was to go away and be edu cated?"

"Isn't there anything," questione the Poor Rich Girl, "that a particularl nice Santa Claus might give you for gift?" She hesitated.

"When I get"—the Rich Poor Gi hesitated—"married, I always hope that I'd be able to have a half-doze silver spoons. None of your plate kind; real ones. They're so classy If there was a regular Santa Clau now—" She hesitated.

The Poor Rich Girl moved over t the window, and stood looking down o the brilliantly lighted avenue. He voice was shaky, just a bit shaky, whe she spoke.

"Little happy girl," she said, "Sant Claus will bring you all the silver yo want. And Santa Claus will invit your Bill up here for his Christma dinner. And Santa Claus will—" he voice relapsed into silence.

Five minutes later the Rich Poo Girl ventured a remark. Her voice wa shy, embarrassed, almost.

"If," she said, "Santa Claus was t bring you a present, what'd you as for? Not," she added, "that there anything you'd want!"

"I'd ask," said the Poor Rich Gir "for love!"

UNDER the Rich Poor Girl's thread bare jacket there beat a joyou heart. But the Poor Rich Girl looke down into the street and the light blurred strangely as she stared at them

Reindeer Meat for American Markets

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE day will soon come when reindeer meat will be as common as beef and mutton in our American markets. The meat will come from Alaska. It will form the basis of a large packing industry, and will be shipped in cold storage steamers and trains to every town in the United States. There are now from 75,000 to 100,000 reindeer in this territory. They are being handled under government regulation and are doubling in number every two or three years. At the present rate of increase there will be 400,000 within six years from this writing, and 800,000 in 1925. By 1931 the number will have increased to more than three million, and five years later it will be almost thirteen million. That will be only twenty years from now, and after that the increase will be so great that reindeer meat will probably be as cheap as any other in the American markets.

The reindeer packing industry is at its very beginning. The first shipments were made about three years ago, when twenty-five reindeer carcasses were shipped to Seattle. The meat was placed on sale and sold at from 20 to 25 cents per pound. More meat was shipped the following year, and just now they are beginning to slaughter the animals for this season's shipment. I saw the work going on in a slaughter house back of Nome. There are in the pens at this time more than one thousand deer ready for the butchers, and perhaps fifteen hundred carcasses will be shipped south this year.

The butcher shop is a large galvanized iron building, with corrals adjoining. There were fifty in each corral. They were as fat as butter and in splendid condition. These reindeer had enormous antlers, but they were not at all fierce. I had expected to see larger and heavier animals. They are of the average size of their kind, but are not taller than Jersey calves at three months of age. Each will weigh, when dressed, from 150 to 175 pounds. The deer are of different colors, some brown, some gray and some as white as snow. Others are spotted. The men who handle the deer and do the killing are Eskimos. They dressed the meat just as our butchers dress beef, and it was then hung upon hooks preparatory to its being chilled and sent in cold storage to Seattle.

During my stay I have had interviews regarding the reindeer industry with Judge Lomen and Mr. Jafet Lindeberg, who was employed by the United States government to bring a herd of reindeer from Norway to Alaska, along about 1898, and he is now one of the biggest owners of reindeer in Alaska. They are enthusiastic as to the prospects. Mr. Lindeberg says that the value of the reindeer now in Alaska is two or three million dollars, but that it cost the government only about three hundred thousand dollars to establish the industry. According to the present laws, the Eskimos and Indians cannot sell their deer, and private parties can only acquire reindeer from the Laplanders who brought the deer over, and the missions who have some deer of their own independent of those that belong to the Eskimos. These laws will probably be changed, with due regard to the protection of the natives.

"DO you think a market for the meat can be created in the United States?" I asked him.

"Yes. There is already such a market in Europe. Norway and Sweden, as well as Finland and Russia, have been shipping large quantities of reindeer meat for years. They send it to the chief European centers, and even to the United States. When I was at Panama, a year or so ago, I saw reindeer meat from Norway among the government supplies. It was bought for the men working on the canal. The northern part of the Russian empire eats more reindeer meat than either beef or mutton.

"I expect the deer meat to compete with the present domestic and foreign meat supplies in the United States, and that we shall be able to put it at a price that will make it possible to do so. The meat is delicious, and there will be a demand for it among the meat-eaters, who like to have a change of diet now and then."

In my talk with Judge Lomen, I asked as to the by-products of the industry. He says the day will come when the packing houses here will have as many by-products as those of Chicago. At present they are able to sell the skins and horns only, in addition to the meat, but in the future the blood will be used for tankage, the hoofs for the making of glue, and certain of the bones for other purposes. Today the horns are sold by the pound to men in Nome, who cut them up and ship them away to be used as knife-handles. The hides are in demand for buckskin gloves and shoe uppers. Some of the skins are tanned and sold as furs. The reindeer fur i dyed, and as such it is more beautifu than the ponyskin coats now worn. Th fur is finer and the skins are lighter.

"Tell me something of the reindee possibilities of Alaska."

"They are great," said Judge Lomen "The first deer were only sixteen, in troduced twenty-five years ago. The were brought across Bering Strait from Siberia, and the first reindeer colon was established at Unalaska in th Aleutian Islands. Today the native have about 50,000 reindeer, which ar worth more than a million dollars and they get an income of $380,00 per annum from them. In addition the government has a large number o deer, and there are other deer owne by private parties.

"As to the number of deer that Alask will support," continued Judge Lomen "it is difficult to say. The whole countr is adapted to reindeer raising, and vast amount of it is fit for nothing else This is so of all the land north of th Yukon, and the most of that which bor ders on Bering Sea. At a low estimate I should say that we have here a terri tory six times as large as the state o New York, upon which the reindeer can feed. They graze upon a peculiar kind of moss that covers the greater part o northern Alaska. This moss is yellowish white in color. It is hard and tough, and looks like coral. It seldom grows more than three inches high, but spread out over the ground, and is a favorit food of the caribou. It is sometime called caribou moss."

Among the other men I have met in Alaska who have had much to do with ie reindeer industry is Mr. W. T. Lopp, ho has charge of the government hools of the territory under the gen- al direction of the bureau of edu- ition at Washington. Mr. Lopp came , Alaska more than a quarter of a ntury ago to engage in teaching, and s first station was at Cape Prince Wales, which is directly opposite beria, across Bering Strait. While iere he was engaged in teaching the skimos, and had conceived the idea introducing reindeer to help them. e proposed to bring deer across the rait from Siberia, at about the same me that Dr. Sheldon Jackson brought s first deer to the Aleutian Islands. little later a number of deer were ought from Siberia and put in the iarge of Mr. Lopp, at a station near ering Strait, and from then until now has had much to do with the rein- ıer owned by the natives. All of the indeer herds so owned are under the iarge of the Bureau of Education, id today Mr. Lopp may be said to be ie patriarchal head of the industry. Moreover, Mr. Lopp has traveled over great part of Alaska with reindeer, id at one time he drove a herd of deer 0 miles across country to relieve a ırty of whalers who were starving on ie coast of the Arctic Ocean. This trip sted two months. It was in the winter, when the average temperature was 20 or more degrees below zero. Part of the journey was over the floating ice of Kotzebue Sound, and when they got to the end of the ice the reindeer had to swim a short distance to the mainland. During that journey Mr. Lopp had only four Eskimos with him, but they got the deer through and saved the lives of the whalers.

I asked Mr. Lopp as to the value of the reindeer for carrying freight and passengers, referring to the fact that the government once expected to use them in transporting the Alaskan mails.

He replied: "Such attempts have been made, but they have not been successful. Many of the stories that have been published as to the speed of the reindeer are untrue. The ordinary deer cannot go more than forty miles a day, and it cannot make more than twenty-five miles a day on long journeys. The reindeer is not hardy, and five or six days is as long as one should be driven at a time.

"The trouble is that the deer has to get its own food on the way. It lives on moss, the nutritive qualities of which are not as great as those of hay. You would not expect to drive a horse a long distance on hay, and you cannot drive a reindeer a long distance on moss, especially if it has to travel all day and hunt for its moss at night. As it is now, it is only in the coldest parts of Alaska that reindeer are used as teams, and there by the Eskimos only. The usual sled load is about three hundred pounds, although as much as 1,600 pounds has been carried by a single deer. Most of the freighting is still done by dogs."

"THE most interesting news relating to the reindeer industry of Alaska," continued Mr. Lopp, "is that concerning the two reindeer fairs recently established as a regular thing in different parts of the country. One of these is annually held at Akiak on the Upper Kuskokwim River, and the other at Mary's Igloo on the Seward Peninsula. These fairs are like the great stock shows of the United States, but their stock is reindeer. The Eskimos bring their deer in from many miles around. They compete as to the finest of the animals, and also as to such matters as lassoing, butchering, driving, feeding and herding. They have races of many kinds, and also prizes for the best kind of harness, sleds and fur clothing. The prizes are contributed by the merchants of Nome, Seattle and elsewhere. The fairs last for several days. They are the great events of the Eskimo year."

Since this talk with Mr. Lopp I have learned more about these reindeer fairs. They are doing wonders in the development of the Eskimos. The Mary's Igloo fair was held last winter. Thousands of Eskimos were present. The fair began January 11 and lasted several days. Part of the time the thermometer was 35 degrees below zero. The people slept on the snow in tents without fire, and all were comfortable in their sleeping bags of reindeer skin.

Among other events a burden race was run for a distance of five miles. The burden consisted of a two-hundred-and-fifty-pound sack, and the winning time was sixteen minutes. The lassoing contest ran through three days, and the man who lassoed the most deer in ninety minutes won. There were eight hundred deer in the herd used for this purpose, and the winner lassoed eleven in ninety minutes.

The wild deer driving contest had fourteen entries, and each of the contestants had to enter a herd, and rope, throw, harness, hitch up and drive a hornless bull one-half mile to the river and return. He had then to unhitch, unharness and remove the halter, all unassisted.

Altogether these fairs are proving a great success, and they promise to increase in interest and profit as the years go on.

Join the Brotherhood and Meet Dr. Hallimond

SLEEP came quickly when I got to bed. The day's work had exhausted me. I went straight to my "pad" without a drink. I felt no ish for a drink or I would have had one, ɔu may be sure of that. It was probably ıe to the fact that I'd been drinking ɛry heavily the previous few days, and ten, after a hard drunk, a fellow's stem sometimes rebels at booze. But that's what kept me going all that day ıd night with only two drinks, it was ıe first time it had ever happened.

I don't say what did it. I'm simply lling you facts.

The following day, my second at the mber pile, was twice as long as the st, twice as hard and twice as profit- ɔle—profitable to the tune of $1.50. nd most of the previous day's pay re- ained in my pocket. Not a drink all ıy! Not one desire to steal! Another ɛw sensation that I thought about a t and couldn't understand.

All day I asked myself if I'd go to the lission that night. Although I'd omised Thompson I would, about iitting time I decided not to. Another 'teen-cent meal and a good stiff ɔoker of whisky and I felt good. I anted it and I bought it. I wanted ıother and I bought that, too. If I'd anted more like I had for years I'd ı' bought them, too. But I didn't. wo whole days and not a drink; two ghts and two drinks each. I was get- ng too good. I remember it made me feel ɛe an old woman. I laughed at myself.

But it made me think. And the more thought the more puzzled I became. s I walked down town, I lost myself ɔmpletely, so wrapped up I was in my ɪn thoughts. After a while I woke up. had stopped in my tracks and was ɪectly in front of the wide-open doors ' the Bowery Mission, the place where didn't want to go. Curiosity got the ɛtter of me again. I'd go in and see ıe show. It was the middle of October, iilly, and I had no coat. Inside the lission it was warm, and there would e hot coffee and rolls. In I went!

But I was wise, and by the time the ɛrvice was over, I'd doped the whole iing out. Those men were bluffers. here was no other answer. Certainly, o sane man would get up in a crowded ublic place, and tell the bunch of how ıany "jobs" he'd pulled off and how ɛligion had saved him. That wasn't in ıe cards—they were fakirs! I knew uman nature, and I knew that kind of uff didn't go along with it. All this 'as "side-show" stuff. And I knew it paid well, too. Oh, I knew it all in those days.

There was to be another day's work for me at the lumber pile. I was tired. I needed the next day's pay, and if I wasn't on the job early and able to work with the rest of the crew, I'd lose out. So another night I went to bed—sober this time—without even one drink!

That evening Charlie Thompson told me to be sure and be on hand the next night, for the superintendent, Dr. Hallimond, would be there, and he wanted me to meet him. I said I would come, and this time I meant it, good and proper. If there was any easy money to be had out of the joint, the man to get it from was the Boss. I'd make Dr. Hallimond fall for me all right.

I was dead set on meeting that superintendent, and I figured the best and easiest way to do it was to take a card and join the Brotherhood. After a fellow does that he meets the whole bunch and gets a chance to mix up with them a bit. And so I decided to take a card that night.

At the end of the meeting, a couple of fellows came down the aisle, just like we do now, handing out the blank membership cards to all who would take one. I was wondering how many of the down-and-outs in the nearby seats would see me and laugh at me. I lost my nerve completely when the man reached me, and I made no effort to get a card. But he stuck a card in my hands and said:

"Take it, anyway. It can't do you harm."

I grabbed it eagerly! Here at last was a direct way to reach a man who had money to hand out to the likes of me, and I was the boy to get it. But I got fooled that night, good and proper! Like now, they made you hold the card overnight, ponder over it, and turn it in the second night. That meant I'd have to come in again. All right, the game was worth it.

I was wise enough to know that it wouldn't do to have a "stew" on or a "hangover" on when I met Dr. Hallimond, and as I was tired out, I again went straight to bed, the third consecutive night, dead sober! I had almost three dollars in my pocket, too.

For a long time I lay awake—thinking—and if you guessed till doomsday, you wouldn't hit on what I was thinking about—that third night at the Mission. There had been a man on the platform who told us all what a raw run he'd given his wife for her money! He told us how he had mistreated her, and dishonored her. But, say! he was a piker alongside of me and the deal I'd given my wife. I couldn't help comparing the two of us, as he spoke. And then he told us that it all had changed since he had come to the Mission! He told us that love had done it. He told us how faithful his wife had been to him all the time he had been unfaithful to her.

For a long time I lay awake, as I say, thinking of that man and his story. I knew his wife couldn't have been treated worse than mine had been or for a longer time, and I knew, too, that she hadn't, or couldn't, have been more loyal than Jane had been.

Suddenly, something happened in my head. Then and there, in that dirty, filthy bed on the Bowery, I felt for the first time a feeling of remorse and shame. That's the truth. It was the first time in my life that I'd ever regretted anything I'd ever done.

That man and his wife and his story kept ringing in my ears and flashing before my eyes! At last the crust of sin, or rust, or mildew, or whatever it was, in which my conscience had been buried for years and years, was pricked. A tiny, tiny bit of light got in. And I cried!

CHAPTER XVIII

Out of Work

I FINISHED that pile of lumber the following day. There was to be no more work at the factory. Why didn't it last and last and last forever? Why did that break come just then? Why was I put to the test so soon? Why couldn't it have come later, when I was more nearly on my feet?

Not a drink all day, nor one at supper. I took a seat at the Mission as far up front as I could get, and I held my card, already signed, in my hand.

A fellow sitting beside me told me to turn it in, because it was good for a bed that night. I nodded to him to let him know I was wise, but I didn't speak. I was thinking of Jane and the great wrong I had done her. The words of the man who had spoken of his wife the night before, kept ringing through my head.

The meeting was over. Charlie Balevre stepped up and greeted me kindly—shook hands with me, just like he meant it. As we walked up-stairs to the Brotherhood Room, he talked to me in a kindly, interested way about my work, and all the time he had hold of my arm. It was a little thing to do, but it made a deep impression on me, and so long as I live I'll never forget it. You see, even though I didn't know it, something was going on within me—something good was going on. The tiny little bit of light of the night before was holding its own—was still aglow.

THE room up-stairs held a couple of dozen fellows, seated here and there in a free and easy manner. Their ease was at once apparent to me. They were listening to a big, broad-shouldered, hearty-faced Englishman. It was

MARY

By Nettie Cole King

I THINK so often of Mary—
  Mary the Mother glad.
Who lived in the Nazareth cottage
  When Christ was a little lad.

I THINK of her in the morning
  As she put on his little frock.
And brushed the curls from his forehead
  Smoothing each shining lock.
And heard him speak with reverence
  A little sunrise prayer.
With a look of childlike wonder
  Upon his face so fair.

When Joseph had gone to the workshop.
  The cottage made trim and neat.
And Jesus played with the children
  Who lived across the street,
I think like the sound of music
  Was the echo of his voice.
Which sent her pulses thrilling
  And made her heart rejoice.

And when he brought his bruises
  For her to touch and kiss,
And she smiled away his troubles
  With all a mother's bliss.
I think that over her spirit
  Stole a promise of endless rest.
As she "magnified the Father"
  Who had given her his best

Then, when the shadows deepened
  And the Child, now tired of play.
Rested his head on her bosom
  At the close of a weary day,
As she taught him a psalm of praises.
  And mused on prophecies dear.
I think that the song of angels
  Fell on her listening ear.

SO I often think of Mary,
  Mary the Mother glad.
Who lived in the Nazareth cottage
  When Christ was a little lad.

Dr. Hallimond, the man I wanted to meet and beat. He had the kindliest and most sympathetic look I'd ever seen. At once I felt here was a man who was different. He came right over to me (I was a newcomer) and shook my hand in a hearty, genuine way that made my blood tingle. He said he was glad to see me. And he was! He's always glad to meet any one in need. He's been glad for thirty-five years, doing that same thing all the time!

Then Charlie Balevre gave me my card of membership in the Brotherhood, and he gave me also a pocket edition of the New Testament. It was with a sneaky, low-down feeling that I put it in my pocket. I didn't open it, for fear I'd expose my ignorance of it and my contempt for it.

Pretty soon we had a quiet, off-to-one-side chat. Dr. Hallimond asked me a great many questions about myself and what I was doing and had been doing. He didn't ask me one embarrassing question. He branched off when he found he was on that track. He didn't scold me or lecture me, despite the fact that I told him some pretty straight stuff.

All the time he was talking to me I kept thinking of my purpose in meeting him, and the more I thought of it, the more I thought what a good fellow he was! Try as I would, though, I couldn't understand him or why he treated me as he did, and no doubt all the others who came to him. As he rose to indicate to me that he had other things to do, he put his hand on my shoulder and asked me if there was anything he could do for me.

Here, then, was what I was looking for—an opportunity to get next—to do him—to put one over on him. The chance had come without the least effort on my part. He had broached the subject of his own accord. And on the tip of my tongue was a story waiting for him. The same kind of a story that had made many, many people come across whenever I'd sprung it. It was to be an easy victory.

BUT the story remained on the tip of my tongue. It's there now! It's never been told! It's dead there! It died that night, as I looked him in the face and replied that there was nothing I wanted of him.

For the life of me, I couldn't hand him the stuff. He was too kind—too good a fellow. I recognized it as kindness. It all dawned on me in a heap at that moment.

For the first time in my life, I felt I'd met up with an honest man—a man who was exactly what he professed to be.

I went to bed that night without a drink, nor did I have the least desire for it. Not a drink all day; not one at night! I awoke early in the morning feeling strong and well, and eager for work—for honest work, of which there was none I could go to. Eager for work! Me! The man I had been! Sounds strange, I guess, but it's the truth.

Monetary Shirkers

By
LUCIA AMES MEAD

THE war has brought an economic miracle to England which may well amaze the world. She finds that, despite the work of four million men withdrawn, and of two million men transferred from constructive work to that of making munitions, the remaining laborers maintain for these six or seven millions that are withdrawn from production and for themselves "a standard of living higher as a whole" than that which was maintained when the six or seven millions were at work. That is to say, the withdrawal of more than half the workers of the country has not lessened production or comfortable living. This great fact has been neglected and its tremendous implications unrealized. It shows that before the war work was so ill-adjusted that not more than one-half the possible production was obtained and the standard of living was twice as low as it need have been.

The fact was that there was no such will to make English life worth living as there is now to make German life not worth living. Women who now give their sons to kill German mothers' sons would not then give an hour's time or a shilling to make life better for the British workman. Sodden poverty and drunkenness were accepted as a matter of course. The new revelations of the latent possibilities of power in the state ought now to create a new determination after the war to prevent the war-debt from crushing the common people. The debt is rising with appalling speed. Every week about $180,000,000 are needed, nearly all of this for war. Most of this colossal sum is borrowed, chiefly from British subjects, in the form of various war loans, treasury bills, and so forth. The annual charges on the national debt as it will be next March will be much over a billion dollars. This sum must be made graphic to be comprehended. It means a sum equal to more than one dollar thrown away every minute since Christ was born. It means that the great masses will pay this stupendous sum to those, mostly wealthy citizens, who have subscribed heavily to war loans. The millions who have given life, health and service are to bear this colossal burden, and those who have loaned are to reap interest!

The preposterous injustice of this arrangement is demonstrated in scathing and statesmanlike fashion in a late number of that notable English publication, War and Peace, which has too few readers in America. The whole number is devoted to showing how the masses ought to relieve themselves of this intolerable burden now and not let the bulk of it pass on to crush the shoulders of children yet unborn. The writer, who is anonymous, is in all probability Norman Angell, who is doing perhaps the shrewdest and most Christian work that is being done in the English-speaking world today. He shows that, though many have subscribed for war loans, the great preponderance of these are held by a few men of great wealth; that the policy of paying five-sixths of the cost of the war out of loans is a policy of disaster. It makes the rich richer and the poor poorer.

TO be sure, economy and giving up luxuries are urged everywhere on posters, and extravagant dress is frowned on: but this can accomplish little. Some revolutionary method must be devised, or all posterity will be paralyzed with debt. The method proposed is so revolutionary as to make conservative Englishmen, rich and poor alike, gasp in amazement. It is the use of the same methods to recruit wealth that Lord Derby so successfully used to recruit men; not conscription, except as a possible last resort, but all those other methods of shaming "slackers" and "shirkers" which were employed after all the millions of volunteers were enlisted and still more were needed.

If life is given freely or else violently commandeered, why should wealth be merely loaned and at five per cent. per annum, reckoned at compound interest? That is the searching question that War and Peace very pertinently asks in view of the recent instance of a large contractor of title and good social standing, who, having offered at the opening of the war to build huts at bare cost, later asked and received a commission of five per cent. above standing charges, and has to date cleared about 190,000 pounds.

"Life is subject to mundane laws: wealth's sacrosanct." The two categories could not exist contemporaneously in the public mind, be it observed, did people really believe what they profess about the war. On one hand, a poor fellow whose country has given him a filthy, crowded slum as a home, whose life is spent in digging coal, whose best outlook is that he may emigrate or by pinching save enough to keep him from a pauper's burial—this man is called to die in agony or to give an arm or leg for a country that has given him small cause to love it. Such men as these have volunteered by the hundred thousand. Here are other men to whom their country has given special privileges of inheritance and primogeniture, whose ancestors discommoned the public land, who have been largely educated on rich foundations and have enjoyed all the large freedom that unearned increment provides; shall they be silent when the call comes for sacrifice? If they are, then let a national Register of Wealth be taken on the same lines as that Register of the People which prepared the way for Lord Derby's plan. Not only possessions that yield income, but those, like jewels, works of art, and deer-parks, that yield satisfaction and can be sold should be reported. The forms must also give account in detail how incomes are spent, how many servants and equipages are kept, how much spent for rent, taxes, clothing, charities, and so forth. War and Peace publishes a suggested blank to be filled out and returned to Mr. Robert Smilie within twenty-one days from date. The delicious audacity and common sense of the whole scheme make the American chuckle, as it will make many a great landed proprietor in England turn apoplectic in horror. The question is, What are you willing to sacrifice for your country? It is suggested that all whose incomes range above 120 pounds a year will find their names on the special red cards marked "eligible for monetary service."

A WEALTH RECRUITMENT COMMITTEE will be headed by a chairman in the rôle of Lord Derby. As the statesmanlike originator of this scheme logically remarks, "It was appropriate that a representative of wealth should have been charged with the task of appealing for men; and it will be no less desirable that a representative of men should be the directive spirit in an appeal for wealth." Local committees would evolve from the central committee; "following the precedent of the Derby committees, on which no man eligible for military service was allowed to act, the membership of the Wealth Recruitment Committee will be confined to workingmen, and preferably to men earning not more than thirty shillings a week. Each member will have a list of twenty-four persons on whom to call with full particulars as to their wealth; to these will previously have been sent a letter explaining the greatness of the national need and asking how much they are willing to sacrifice." Attested surplus incomes will be ranged in groups, the first being those of over 100,000 pounds a year. There will be no threats of absolute com sion as in the Derby scheme for win recruits; conscientious objectors believe the war to be wrong will be n cifully considered and not receive

Monetary Volunteers

THE terrific war in Europe has called out of savings-banks and bank-books and teacups and even children's tin banks a tremendous sum of money for the relief of that great number of men, women and little children who without offense on their part have been the greatest sufferers of all. Suffering from wounds soon ends in death or cure, though of course in many cases permanent injury results. As a matter of military economy ample provision is made for the care of wounded soldiers. But a broken heart who can heal? A ruined home who can replace? Blasted hopes who can revive when nothing but destruction and want are on every hand?

So, while unthinkable sums of money have been demanded and received by governments for the prosecution of the war, and have poured into the coffers of makers of munitions of war, a steady stream of gold has flown out from sympathetic Americans for the relief of those whom war has devastated.

We suggested that Thanksgiving Day could well be signalized in every household by the serious consideration of this great need and of the household's ability to give either once or regularly for the alleviation of this woe. Christmas Day is even more fitting for such a Christlike act. We hope that Christmas ıe child slipped up and whispered in r ear.

"Bossy, bossy, fine as silk, let down ur bag and give me some milk," she ged.

The cow, a plain New Hampshire eature, unused to being addressed in is lyric fashion, struggled to her feet d mooed in astonishment, while milla fled in terror. She was almost the door, when, splash! she nearly l into a pail of milk. There it stood, iting to be carried into the house, a eat pail of foaming milk, and near it basket of white eggs. There was no e around, no one at all, except a hen th a red comb that was peering cauusly at the child from a high rafter. en God didn't seem to be watching. ıe thought comforted little Camilla t a little as, laden down, she sped ward home again. She was still inking of it when she said her prayers at night after she had put the little ters to bed.

"Please God, forgive me for being a r and a thief," she prayed, "but, dear d, there really wasn't any other way."

The loss of milk and eggs at the ick farm was soon trumpeted about e neighborhood, for a side of bacon lowed, and a rabbit which Benedict d snared in the snow and left ready essed in the barn while he milked the ws. He could have sworn that there is no other person but himself in the rn; but yet, when he gathered up pails in the early twilight and turned pick up the rabbit, the rabbit was ne.

"It's a ghost," he thought, dismally.

"Ghost! Fiddlesticks!" Camilla deared, when she heard about it. "Like not you never caught a rabbit at . Only dreamed it."

"I never dreamed a rabbit," old nedict sputtered. "Come around in e cornfield and I'll show you the od on the stone."

Camilla Wick threw down a basket potatoes she was carrying near the rn door and followed her brother out his trap. There was blood on the ne and a gray rabbit-skin on a snownk. Evidently Benedict had not eamed it. And when she came back her potatoes, the potatoes were ne!

After that she watched the barn, but thout avail, although in one gray ilight the two Camillas stood so close gether that if either had put out a nd she would have touched the other.

LL this time Christmas was drawing nearer. It was two days off when milla Wick finished her cretonne g, the bag which was destined for rs. Judge Homer. Mrs. Homer reived it by the evening mail among lot of other parcels.

"My word!" she said. "A bag! at makes twelve this year and ten st year. What do folks think I need so many bags? There's no name on I expect Cousin Annie sent it me om Fall River."

She threw it aside carelessly, for she is busy herself tying up numberless ristmas packages, with all the happy isto of a natural-born Santa Claus. nong those for whose Christmas she lt responsible was old Mrs. Geoffrey the hill. Mrs. Homer went up there her auto the day before Christmas to rry an eider-down quilt and a purple nnel kimono.

"Things to keep you warm these ld nights," she said. "I'm always raid your baseburner will go out and u'll get a chill."

"You're always good to me, Nettie," d Mrs. Geoffrey exclaimed. "Land, don't know what I'd do without you! nd it ain't only me that would miss u. It would be all the folks in the unty. I suppose you've heard about atira Fisher coming home with her ung ones?"

"No," Mrs. Homer said.

"She's been widdered and she's come me with three little girls to the old mes place. I'm worried about them. s far as I can see they ain't had no tcher's meat, and only one order of oceries went out from Jefferson's. What air they livin' on, Nettie? I lay awake nights and wonder if them children air hungry."

"How was she left?" Mrs. Homer inquired.

"Poor as a church mouse. Camilla Wick says she expects to do dressmaking; but I'm afraid it's goin' to be hard scratchin' to build up a trade here. Sallie Adams sews and cuts over for most folks. I have my doubts they're starvin'. Why, they couldn't git no vittals in there without my knowin' it. Husband don't take no interest. And it's Christmas time!"

"Now, don't you worry," Mrs. Homer said, comfortingly.

She tied her scarf closer about her throat and picked up her muff.

"I'll see to it myself," she declared.

She had a new five-dollar bill in her pocketbook, and after she reached home she cogitated as to how she should send it. All at once her eye was caught by the rosy hue of the cretonne bag full of Christmas significance. She picked it up and looked it over. Miss Wick's card was concealed by a bow of the cherry ribbon. She was sure that it came from Cousin Annie at Fall River, and Cousin Annie was a woman after her own heart. Impulsively Mrs. Judge Homer slipped the bill into the cretonne bag and rewrapped it in the pasteboard box. Ten minutes later it was on its way to the James farm.

Little Marion carried it in to her mother in wide-eyed astonishment.

"From Santa Claus for you," she said.

Mrs. Fisher struggled up on the pillow to look at it.

"A Christmas present!" she exclaimed. "Now I wonder who would send me a present?"

But when she saw the five-dollar bill in the cretonne bag she began to cry weakly. She knew from whom it came long before she discovered the visiting-card pinned under the cherry ribbon.

"It's Camilla Wick," she sobbed. "She's the only one in the wide world who would remember me. She was fond of your poor pa. And it's come in the nick of time, for Milla's worrying about money. Find Milla for me."

About that time Camilla Wick, unconscious of the generous attributes ascribed to her by her neighbor, was hard at work cooking her Christmas dinner. The turkey had come out of the oven, and two big mince pies stood on a side table giving out appetizing odors. Camilla was straining her cranberry jelly when the kitchen door was burst open and old Benedict appeared.

"That ghost's in the barn again!" he declared, in a terrified voice.

This time Camilla did not say fiddlesticks. She wiped her hands grimly on her apron, caught her Paisley shawl from the hook behind the door and started off. Benedict stopped to wring his hands and stare in speechless misery at the turkey before he followed her out. He overtook her just within the barn door, where she had paused to pick up his gun, which leaned against a post. With one hand he tried to pull the gun from her, while with the other he pointed to the corner, where a little wavering shadow was dimly defined against a manger. At the same moment the gun went off with a thunderous roar, alarming the chickens and bringing even the cows from their stalls in bewilderment and terror. In the dark obscurity of the barn something screamed shrilly and then was silent. Camilla's strength left her at that cry. She caught at the neck of her dress and reeled a bit.

"Get your lantern," she told Benedict, with shaking lips.

It seemed as if he never could light it; but at last he did, and they went cautiously forward. There by the manger, with her pretty hair dabbled with blood, they found little Camilla Fisher. Three big turnips lay at her feet, and some cabbage leaves which Benedict had brought out for the chickens to peck at. Her heart was still beating; but she lay in an unconscious heap that terrified them. They carried her between them to the house, and on the way Benedict reproached his sister for the first time in his whole life.

"See what your un-Christian hatred can do!" he cried, hotly.

Camilla Wick set her teeth and did not answer him. The sight of those cabbage leaves had stirred her strangely. They had told a tale which she had understood. From somewhere in the great spaces of infinity Alfred Fisher's spirit seemed to come nearer, to be somehow inseparably entwined with that of his little daughter, until she almost felt as if the outrage had been perpetrated upon him. Slow tears rolled down her face.

SHE carried little Milla into the best bedroom and sent Benedict hurriedly for the doctor. In the meanwhile she had found a slight wound in the child's head and bathed the blood away and used some simple restoratives. When little Milla opened her eyes she was enthroned in a great wide bed, under a silk quilt, while a white-faced woman watched over her, solicitously. At first the child thought she was dreaming. Delicious smells floated about her; there was a fire on the hearth, before which sat a white cat, and a moment later Miss Wick was mutely offering a full tray. Camilla Wick had cut some of her Christmas cake and filled a saucer with her best peach preserves and brewed a cup of tea in a tiny blue china teapot that exactly matched a sugar bowl and cream pitcher. Somehow for a woman who had never been a mother Camilla Wick had ideas. But little Milla pushed the tray away.

"I want to get up," she said, gaspingly. "I want to go home to my mamma!"

"You have had a great shock," Camilla replied. "You must lie still like a good girl. You were hurt in my barn. Thank God it was no worse!"

Her awkward hand touched the child's shoulder with an unaccustomed caress. Little Milla shrank under it. She put one arm over her head and peered at Miss Wick from the shelter.

"Do you know I stole?" she whispered. "Did God tell you?"

"Yes, God told me," Camilla Wick said, trembling.

"But did he tell you that my mamma was sick and the babies were hungry?"

"Yes, dear."

"Did he tell you that I am the big sister and have to do things? Even if I steal?" the child asked, solemnly.

"Oh, little Milla, yes!"

Miss Wick's voice broke, and she went down on her knees, drawing the reluctant little head to her bosom.

"It was all my fault," she whispered. "I had a hard heart like Pharaoh, king of Egypt. Oh, Fred, Fred, how could I do it! Your own little girl. So like you! So like you, Fred!"

The two Camillas were still wrapped in each other's arms when the doctor arrived; but there were smiles now amid the tears.

"What did you send for me for?" the doctor demanded. "That's not a sick child. All she needs is a stomachful of turkey. Get her a drumstick," he concluded, gruffly.

But Camilla Wick had other plans. She made Benedict get out the sleigh, and she packed it with all the cooked eatables there were in the house. She carried the turkey in her own lap as she drove up the hill to the Fisher farm, and Milla seated by her side held, triumphantly, the two mince pies. Benedict and the doctor followed behind in the doctor's sleigh. They had an assorted cargo of blankets and potatoes and wood and milk and eggs, and even a Christmas tree which Benedict had climbed out and cut on the road. Old Mrs. Geoffrey, gazing through her spy-glass, saw the queer cavalcade going up the hill. She laid down her spy-glass and wiped her eyes.

"Now may the Lord above bless Camilla Wick's Christmas!" she whispered to herself, her gaze turning from the snow-clad landscape to where above the mountain the evening star shone clear and cold, the star, perhaps, that so many centuries ago shone on the Wise Men carrying their gifts.

And to Camilla Wick it seemed as if her life had begun anew.

Neōlin Soles

Outside the schoolhouse the children are sliding in the slush and mud and wet. They don't remember their damp little feet and their soggy little stockings and their drippy little shoes, not they!

But they'll stay in the schoolroom all day long, and bring home a cough or cold to worry mother and call the doctor in.

Listen, mother: You can't stop the Winter wet, but you can stop buying leather shoe-soles that drink wet.

You can buy Neōlin, the modern shoe-sole. Science made it waterproof, and better than rubber because it won't draw like rubber.

And better than good leather, as your dwindling shoe-bills will tell.

Also Science made Neōlin a flexible, natural tread which comforts and beautifies feet. And it will improve even the best grade shoes.

Further, Neōlin is always the same on any price of shoe, from highest to moderately priced. And Neōlin soled shoes cost no more. Retailers have them or can get them at no added cost to you. Avoid imitations. Ask for Neōlin with the accent on the "O"—and mark that mark; stamp it on your memory: Neōlin —

Christ Coming, and Coming to Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for December 31. Rev. 22:6-21. A Review Lesson

The Keynote and Challenge of the Book of Books

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

ONCE more we review a year of reading and study in the Holy Bible. It is a good time to estimate once more its central message as it has come home to our souls. This closing chapter may furnish us with a keynote and challenge, an interpretation and a mission for us all. The Bible is a record of human progress—take it from one side—from prehistoric superstition on through ceremonial religion and thence to the pure religion of the spirit. It is also a record of the forthgoing of God, revealing his nature and his will increasingly to his creatures as they are able to receive and understand. Let us dare to say that in it all God is the Great Guide on the way of life—the Great Companion of the seeking soul—the Friend of all who strive and suffer. God cares; God knows; God saves. God is Love. God is Light, and with him is no darkness at all.

"Come!" is one of the watchwords of the Infinite Mind in his dealings with the finite. "Come and see!" The Scriptures are the record of a Great Investigation. Or rather of the Great Adventure of Faith. Its heroes hear the Spirit of God calling, and like Abraham they come forth out of the commonplace and the settled to try mighty experiments with him. In the times of sin and greed the call changes, becoming a challenge to holiness: "Come ye out from among them and be ye separate." In prosperity and in joy the same Spirit moves to psalms and prayers: "O come, let us worship and bow down." The Eternal takes man into his counsels in Isaiah: "Come, let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow. . . . Come unto me, hear, and your soul shall live."

The Lord's Invitation

"COME" is Christ's gracious invitation to the weary and the disheartened: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." To the alert and eager to serve, "Come with me and I will make you fishers of men." To the thoughtless who consider allegiance easy, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." To the spiritually needy, conscious of their lack, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." The Great Captain of our salvation has the quality of the ideal leader: "With you always"—come, follow me. Where we could not go of ourselves, where our faith would not suffice, we dare venture in his strength, for he calls us to the endeavor. We hear him when we are like Peter in the ship, looking out over the impassable water: "Lord, bid me come." And Jesus again, as of old, says "Come." The impossible is within our reach when he calls across the waves. And always his invitation appeals to aspiration and to achievement. It is always, "Friend, come up higher."

"I Will Come"

IN his great farewell discourse in John's Gospel Jesus assured his disciples that he would not leave them comfortless, desolate; he would come to them. "If any man love me he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." The same message rings out even to the visionless church of Laodicea, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to him." Where'er there is the least response and opportunity Christ comes and enters in.

How natural and how human for those early disciples to long for his speedy return in the flesh as they had known him during those beautiful days in Galilee! It is clear that every one of them expected Jesus to return during his own lifetime. But they soon learned the secret of having his real presence in the spirit. Paul's early letters breathe eagerly the hope of the Lord's bodily return. But later he learned to say, "For me to live is Christ," even though he believed it gain to die and be with Christ, far from the turmoil and the temptation of the world. It would have been a very terrible loss if they had forgotten the promise of his presence in the expectation of the coming in glory. So too it is with us today. Many are fond of reasoning and disputing as to whether the end of the age is at hand, or whether the world is young yet and the Gospel just beginning its vigorous career. However our human wisdom judges this, it is all-important that we should be found faithful, having the witness of the Spirit that we are children of God. Should he come we would be glad to be found at our task. Should his plan be otherwise, we must get to work to accomplish the world enterprise that he has committed unto his disciples.

Comings of the Christ

EVERY great epoch in Christian history is in a very true sense a coming of the King. When the Spirit fell on the day of Pentecost there was a very real return of Christ to his disciples. When the great evangelistic movement of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries took form Christ indeed came into his church and enlarged her work. With the dawn of modern world-missions, came Christ in new manifestations of power and grace. Therefore Peter and John were in a deep spiritual sense reincarnations of Christ when they stood and healed the beggar at the Beautiful Gate of the temple. Therefore John Wesley came as an ambassador on behalf of Christ beseeching men as though God were entreating through him. On behalf of Christ he went out into the highways and the fields and preached at the mouth of the coalpits, beseeching men to be reconciled with God. And as in Galilee, so in Wesley's England, the common people heard him gladly. We are all very sure that Christ was with Livingstone and Payton and Judson and the rest. Through them people that sat in darkness saw a great light—even the light of the coming of Jesus with peace and guidance for all the world.

Besides these great comings of Christ there is the genuine and wonderful experience of the multitude of indivi uals who have accepted Jesus as the Lord of their lives. Christian hymnoc is full of the pæans of joy uttered l saved men and women to whom he h become a personal Saviour and a prese Deliverer from sin and aimlessness. I comes and comes and comes again high and low, to rich and poor, worthy and unworthy. Christ comin and coming to Christ! For he meets more than half way. He that aske receiveth, and he that seeketh findet Whoever will come to Jesus may kno for himself the coming of the Messi of God.

"Even So, Come, Lord Jesus"

THIS may be our Christmas prayer that Christ may be born in o hearts by faith. "Come to us, Bless Master, and we shall make room in o souls for thee!" Let us open wide t door that he may enter in. May the Ne Year be glorious because Christ sh indeed come to us. "Come, Jesus, toil or comfort, in sorrow or in pea but do thou so move upon my spirit th I may know thee when thou comest whatsoever guise." What a sad thing is to fail to receive the little child in h name, and so to turn him away when comes! How many do not realize th the poor, the sinful, the sorrowing, are many opportunities to minister unto t Christ who comes to us thus strangel

He that Is Athirst, Let Him Come

WHAT a beautiful golden text it i "And the Spirit and the Bri say, Come. And he that heareth, l him say, Come. And he that is athir let him come; he that will, let him ta the water of life freely." This is t Gospel. The Spirit of God and the tr church call for Christ. All who tru hear, long for Christ. Yet there nothing impractical, nothing too othe worldly in it. For all who have need of soul, of body, of life—hearing t great longing invitation to Christ, con to seek him where others want him to Those who long most earnestly for t indwelling of Christ have him mos Those who are deep in prayer are reac est to impart spiritual truth. Even t man most conscious of his own need a far better light-giver than the satisfi or the worldly. In the church where t faithful seek, many souls flock to hear, a to find for themselves the living wat

Sunday School Methods

How to Develop the Lesson Facts

AN expert teacher in New York had the plan of making a word picture of the facts, calling upon the scholars to fill in important links in this picture. It would seem to be better for teacher and scholar to cooperate in bringing out these points, than for the teacher to do it all.

A teacher of a class of girls has this plan:

> Somewhat as history is taught as a logical sequence, certain acts bringing certain effects, one fact leading to the next.

Another teacher of 16-year-old girls presents the lesson facts "usually from outline" utilizing the blackboard for this purpose.

A boys' teacher in Georgia succeeds—

> By having the boys give their ideas in talks about one minute in length.

A New York State teacher of 12 intermediate boys says:

> I try to have each step lead up to the important practical teaching and spiritual truth, but always try to make home thrusts of living truth all the way through.

Another teacher of girls in Kansas:

> I try to develop the facts logically and work up to the climax, bringing out the thoughts of love, service, and obedience to our Lord.

A Kansas teacher of young men:

> I vary. Sometimes I ask one student to give the historical situation. Sometimes give the setting, sometimes by blackboa outline, sometimes by topics previously giv out.

A former Attorney General of t State of Ohio has this excellent meth with his class of young ladies:

> I develop the facts of most lessons by brief statement of "Who? When? Wher What?" I draw upon my travels, on cla experiences, to make it real. Use mode terms and personages.

A teacher of young married people New Jersey uses the good old plan time, persons, places, acts, as the fo steps in the development of the less material.

A Brooklyn teacher of 10-year-o girls does not attempt to cover t much ground. She uses "the less questions generally and covers just many great facts. I generally choo maybe three, very important ones a stay with them until the class ful begins to see them."

An earnest Colorado teacher uses "t text, with my Bible in hand. I let t book do its own developing, the cla using their Bibles."

Vividness in fact presentation is t plan of a New York City teacher 12-year-old boys:

> I make the story as full of life as possib I make it vivid—use the first person in spea ing, and try to make them see a series pictures and feel the real people.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

AMERICA stands just now before an open door. As the leader of all the nations not directly involved n the terrible war, the United States as now the opportunity, under ivine blessing, to help bring the orld back to peace. Mediation may ucceed now. Why should the voice f America be stilled by declarations f statesmen seeking their own advange? Humanity has rights above ere nationality, and it is humanity at is being offered upon the altar of rife. It is a time for prayer. This ation, upon its knees before God, ay be given the spiritual strength to ake its voice heard above the umult.

The members of the Prayer League re requested to join in earnest rayer that God may inspire the aders of our nation, and that, in nion with the other neutral nations, e may find a way opened for mediaon that will stop the war. Pray hat the Omnipotent God may bring ulers and cabinets to see the folly nd wickedness of prolonging the ar, and to accept mediation, if it e in accordance with the divine will. ay these supplications, in the name f Jesus the Merciful Saviour, be cceptable, and be made the means f bringing the world back to peace, nd to the acknowledgment of God's overeignty over all nations and overnments.

WE have a Father who waits our cry for help, a God who answers prayer. The Saviour himself oth set us the example and commanded s to pray. And the early church was uch in prayer. Prayer opened Paul's yes. Peter was in prayer when he saw he vision that sent him to the centurion t Joppa. Prayer opened heaven before he eyes of the dying Stephen. Prayer rought Paul safely through shipwreck nd gave him the opportunity he had ng coveted, to preach Christ in the enter of the Roman world. Prayer ustained Huss and Luther, Calvin and nox and Wesley, guided the Pilgrims nd strengthened the Huguenots. And t is just as potent today, and the nswer just as sure, as in any year since he world began.

Mrs. L. J. B. writes: "I want to raise God for his good gifts and for his nswers to past prayers." She asks the eague to pray for the success of revival neetings that are to be held in her hurch. She is praying that the members may be filled with the spirit for vinning souls, and that there may be great awakening among the people; nd she asks the League to join her in his prayer. She asks prayer also that he cottage prayer meetings may become local Prayer League.

Mrs. E. T. praises God for the release f her son from prison on parole, and he asks the League to pray that God nay take care of him and strengthen im; for his trouble has been weakness f will rather than evil intent. He has een placed with relatives far from the cene of his trouble. The mother's eart is burdened with a half-formed ear that the disgrace may follow him nd that he may not be able to rise bove it or to live it down. The Prayer League will pray, therefore, both that God's grace may be ample for the mother's heart and that His power may shield the son and guide him in the ways of strength and virtue, guiding him first to the Saviour and to full repentance and complete redemption.

G. E. M. praises God for the great victory that prayer has brought to the temperance cause, and she asks prayer for herself that she may be able to find a way out of financial difficulty, and for her son that he may overcome a difficulty in his speech.

Mrs. W. O. J. rejoices in the answers to prayer, and she asks that the League join her in prayer for the end of this terrible war.

Mrs. J. B. C. asks prayer for her grandmother, who is suffering with heart trouble and is feeling despondent and lonely. She says that letters from the League would cheer and comfort her grandmother. Letters addressed to Mrs. A. C. W. in care of the Prayer League will be forwarded. Mrs. J. B. C. asks also for prayers for herself that she may overcome nervousness, which has afflicted her for several years.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Kings Valley, Ore.; Angola, N. Y.; Franklinton, N. C.; Bardolph, Ill.; Orlando, Fla.; Saltsburg, Pa. (for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon church and community, that the members may have a deeper and fuller experience); Wauchula, Fla. (that many may be saved during revival here); Geneva, N. Y. (that many may be saved during revival here); Chambersburg, Pa. (that more interest may be shown in the Women's Missionary Society); Wichita, Kan. (that many may be saved during revival); Milwaukee, Wis. (that many may be saved during revival); Louisville, Ky. (pray for prohibition throughout the states).

Mrs. G. E. W. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; three parents ask prayer that their daughters' minds may be restored; eleven friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends and relatives.

D. M. B. asks prayer that a oung mother's sight may be restored; K. W. asks prayer that mother's sight may be restored; three friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened; four friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; two wives, their husbands; six, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Nineteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; eleven wives, their husbands; including K. L. C., that husband may treat his family kindly and be saved; thirty-eight, for other relatives or friends.

Fifteen readers ask prayer for special blessing for others; including Mrs. J. W., that grandson, who is away, may be kept in health and from the snares and temptations that beset young men.

Sixty-four ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including M. T., that daughter may gain her speech and learn to read and write; thirty-two friends, for healing for themselves, including Mrs. G. A. C. and E. C., that health may be restored without an operation; another, M. H., "that I may regain the use of hands and arms." Ten friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Twenty friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. L. J. B., Wauchula, Fla.; M. H., La Salle, N. Y.; F. O. R., Witt, Va.; Mrs. M. S. H., Dayton, Wash.; Trusting, Wheeling, Ill.; Mrs. C. J. E., Elmora, Pa.; Mrs. C. L. W., Ames, Iowa; M. D. T., Adams, Ill.; S. I. W., Amherst, Va.; C. C., Newell, S. D.; Mrs. A. M. T., Rimer, Pa.; K. V. L., Annapolis, Md.; Mrs. L. B. J., Lynn, Mass.; Mrs. A. G. J., Dinuba, Calif.; A. S. C., North Leverett, Mass.; M. L., Kellogg, Idaho; Mrs. E. F., Port Arthur, Texas; F. L., Janelew W. Va.; Mrs. S. H. N., Carlstadt, N. J.; Mrs. M. V. S., Bushnell, Ill.; Anxious Mother, Fruita, Colo.; Mrs. S., Pottsville, Pa.; Mrs. R., Rochelle, Ill.; C. B. M., Manchester, N. H.; I. B., Claypool, Ind.; Reader, Brydton, Va.; Mrs. A. P., Colchester, Vt.; Mrs. S. P., Evansville, Ind.; W. G., Ashland, Mass.

THE World's Evangelical Alliance has prepared this series of topics for use by all the Protestant churches of the nation during the week of prayer, December 31 to January 6:

Sunday, December 31—Sermons from one of these texts: "Another Year's Respite." Luke 13 : 8, 9. "Christ the Head of the Church." Eph. 1 : 22, 23. "The Triumph of Faithfulness in National Life." Hab. 2 : 4. "The Only 'If.'" John 12 : 31, 32. "The God of Our Fathers." I Chron. 28 : 9. "The Constraint of Christ's Love." II Cor. 5 : 14.

Monday, January 1—Thanksgiving and Humiliation. Ps. 103 : 1–5; Rom. 8 : 31–39; Ps. 51; Rev. 3 : 14–32.

Tuesday, January 2—The Church Universal—the "One Body," of Which Christ Is the Head. Prayer for the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, for revival, purification, growth in unity and love that embraces mankind. Isa. 54 : 2–5; John 20 : 19–23; Acts 2 : 1–4; I Cor. 12 : 4–7.

Wednesday, January 3—Nations and Their Rulers. Ps. 24; Ps. 101; I Tim. 2 : 1–8; I Peter 2 : 13–25.

Thursday, January 4—Missions Among the Heathen. Ps. 2; Luke 4 : 40–44; Rom. 16 : 25–27.

Friday, January 5—Families, Schools, Colleges and the Young. I Kings 3 : 5–15; II Tim. 3 : 14–17; Matt. 19 : 13–15.

Saturday, January 6—Missions at the Home Base. Ps. 2; Luke 10 : 25–37; Rom. 11 : 13–21.

"And just think, Mother, how much we saved"

"It's the prettiest dress I ever had—and this hat is a perfect dear. Then there are your two waists and skirt and the frocks for Bess and Dorothy. And the materials for everything we've made cost less than one of those dresses I had last spring."

This is an example of the savings in one home out of hundreds in city, town and country all over America now that women are finding the easy, delightful way to clothes-economy through the simple and practical home-study Courses in Dressmaking and Millinery offered by the

WOMAN'S INSTITUTE OF DOMESTIC ARTS & SCIENCES INC.

The Woman's Institute is associated with the International Correspondence Schools, which perfected correspondence instruction and in 25 years have trained more than a million men for successful careers. The Woman's Institute teaches the domestic arts and sciences in the home—the natural place to learn them. It helps women to be more efficient housewives or trains them for well-paying professions. Its students range in age from 12 to 65 years. Its textbooks are so clearly written and illustrated that anyone can understand them. Its courses are sold on plans that place them within the reach of every woman.

What Others Say
I learned more in nine weeks by taking up your study than in the whole course I took at a resident school.
Mrs. Huldah G. Reuter
Brooklyn, N. Y.
One can learn through these lessons in a few months what it would take years to learn in a workroom.
Mrs. Mary H. Blake
Wollaston, Mass.
Your course is all you claim it to be. If I am left to my own resources, I can now make a good living for myself and two small children.
Mrs. Mabel Gorrell
Danville, Ind.
I wish every woman who desires to always appear at her best could take advantage of the wonderful opportunity you offer her.
Mrs. Grace M. Lake
Lincoln, Ill.
I enjoy every minute of the work. I wonder why we stay untaught when the way is so pleasant and so within the means of everyone.
Mrs. J. C. Reynolds
Corning, N. Y.

You can save half or more of the money you now spend for clothes, or have at least twice as many dresses and hats, by making them yourself. And by our entirely new, easy method you can now learn to make them, in spare time, right in your own home. You can have a $35 suit for $15, a $20 dress for $8, a $10 hat for $3 or $4 and children's clothes for a mere fraction of what they now cost you. You can have clothes that are more becoming and better fitting, because they will be made of the materials and in the styles that you select, and to your own measurements.

Fascinating, New, Easy Method
Ours is a new method, based on 25 years' experience in correspondence teaching. Our courses are so simple that you grasp their meaning instantly—so practical you start making garments at once. Nearly every step is pictured. In the words of one fashion expert, "The illustrations are so clear that you could almost learn dressmaking from the pictures alone."

Be a Dressmaker or Milliner
With the thorough training these Courses give you, you can go into business, secure a good paying position, or open a shop of your own. The demand for dressmakers and milliners is greater than the supply. You can prepare for success in either field right at home in spare time—no going away or serving a long apprenticeship.

Send this coupon or a letter or postal today and let us tell you all about the Course in which you are interested most. Your mere request will not obligate you in any way, but will bring you—free—the full story of how you can dress better at less cost or prepare for a pleasant and profitable profession.

What These Courses Teach You
In Dressmaking, how to make all stitches and seams; draft patterns; use tissue paper patterns; judge, select, buy and use materials; make simple, practical waists, skirts and dresses, perfect-fitting underwear and lingerie, dainty infants', children's and misses' clothing, afternoon coats, suits and dresses, evening gowns and wraps, tailored coats, skirts and complete suits; renovate, dye and make over garments; make and use embroidery; use colors harmoniously; dress in taste and style; get a position or go into business as a dressmaker.

In Millinery, how to make and cover foundation crowns and brims; make straw and other kinds of braid hats; select, buy and use millinery materials; renovate, clean and dye materials; make and apply ribbon flowers and bows; plan and make all kinds of hats becoming to your own individuality; make children's and misses' hats, copy hats you see on the street, in the shops and in fashion magazines; use colors harmoniously; go into business as a milliner.

Young People's Topics for December 31

Lessons to Learn from the Past

Eph. 5 : 15–21 (New Year's Conquest Meeting). America's World Responsibility. Gen. 12 : 1–13 (B. Y. P. U. only). Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics.

IT has been well said that when a man begins to live in the past he gives evidence that old age is gripping him. Youth lives in the future, middle age is more concerned with today, but the past is the foundation upon which the structure of today and the building of the future must rest, and it cannot be lightly passed over. The military chief studies the great battles of history, not because he expects to fight similar battles, but that he may discover the laws of combat. The scientist studies the work of scientists of all ages not only to learn what they have proven, but to discover the underlying laws which he must understand if he would go forward. The statesman studies history for similar reasons, and the follower of Christ who would gain victories over organized evil and over human tendencies to sin must know what has been done, where success has been achieved, where failure has shown earnest effort to have been misguided. Human nature changes little. It will act today and tomorrow very much as it did yesterday and the day before. The sinner who has reached the end of his resources and who is face to face with failure will be full of repentance and remorse and the one who is blessed with this world's goods will be skeptical of truth, stiff-necked and hard-hearted. In the past, times of prosperity have been times of weakness in the church. It need not be. The early disciples waited in prayer ten days for the outpouring in power of the Holy Spirit. That lesson we of today need to learn. We chafe under delay, but we can do little, and what we do will be done wrong if we act in our own strength alone. The lesson we can learn profitably from the past is that our manifold organizations, our various groups, our individual lives, are but channels through which Omnipotence may work to save a world. It is our business to keep the channels clear.

America has a great responsibility as the most powerful of neutral nations. Among nations great reliance has been placed on treaties and alliances. Few treaties have remained unbroken, few alliances have survived. Only the promises of God stand sure, unbroken, and to a great extent unclaimed. America owes the world a clear example of a truly Christian civilization; a civilization in which redeemed manhood rules; in which justice, though tempered with love, cannot be influenced; in which labor of head or of hand receives its full reward; of a nation which honors God and enthrones him, which stands square and upright before the world, and keeps faith with the strong and the weak because it neither fears nor covets.

Beginning All Over Again

Epworth League Topic. Phil. 3 : 12–15.

BEGINNING all over again is to a degree impossible. We cannot wipe the slate clean of every memory, of all experience. Therefore we begin each new year with just a little advantage over each previous one. But we can begin over again in this, that we can steer a straighter course and avoid the rocks and shallows that have made hard sailing in the past. We can forget the transitory things that are behind. But we cannot afford to forget the experience that is ours because of those things. For instance, if in the year past neglecting our daily prayer has cost us our intimate touch with God, and has weakened our power for him, we are not going to forget that and go on into this year to be sorrowed by a like experience. But we will remember; we will not look back to our day of weakness; we will look forward to Christ, who has promised to bring us to perfection, and our eye will be kept steadily upon him by the memory of the former loss.

Remembering all in the past that is vital to the present or to the future, we may forget all the rest, and can "press on toward the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." We have failed; that does not mean that we must fail again. We can expect full success this year regardless of the partial successes of the past. We can and should forget everything that would handicap us in the struggle ahead during the new year. History is full of accounts of people doing the thing that couldn't be done. If you have failed, try harder. An army doesn't stop fighting because it has been driven back from the first charge and a football team only plays the harder when the ball has been fumbled and lost. Forget the failure, but remember its lessons and go forward.

Merry Moments

WHEN the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

AN EASY JOB. Little seven-year-old James came home from school the first day with a determined look on his face.

"Mother," he cried. "I'm going to quit school and be a school teacher!"

"Why, James," said his mother laughingly, "how can you? You don't know enough yet!"

"Don't know enough?" exclaimed the would-be school teacher. "You don't have to know anything! All you've got to do is ask questions!"

A NARROW ESCAPE. The teacher was giving a lesson on Ireland. Little Johnnie waved his hand vigorously for permission to speak. "My father," he said, "came pretty near being an Irishman. My grandmother left Ireland just two weeks before he was born."

WHO TOLD HER? In a certain church, at a mid-week meeting, the minister asked if any one had noticed any irreverence in the church. One member of the meeting raised her hand, and when asked what it was replied, "So much looking around in prayer time."

A REACTING TEST. A visitor was testing the class.

"Now, children," she said. "I had five dollars the other day, and went shopping. I bought a hat for three dollars and a pair of gloves for one dollar. Then I spent fifty cents for some handkerchiefs. How much had I left?"

A little sharp-eyed girl said quickly, "Mama always tells us to count our change before we leave the store. If you did that, you'd know."

DID SHE DO IT? Grandma had a very bad cold one day when her little granddaughter made her a visit.

Suddenly she sneezed very hard. Much pleased with the unexpected excitement the child looked up and said, "Honk again, grandma."

NO MULETEER. A gentleman farmer tells of a city lad who once worked for him.

The lad was called one winter morning before dawn and told to harness the mule.

The lad was too lazy to light a lantern, and in the dark he didn't notice that one of the cows was in the stable with the mule. The farmer, impatient at the long delay, shouted from the house:

"Billy! Billy! What are you doing?"

"I can't get the collar over the mule's head," yelled back the boy. "His ears are frozen."—Collier's Weekly.

NO REASON FOR MOVING. Erastus Johnson operated a ferry across the Alabama River. One day he was accosted by a poor white stranger who wanted to cross but hadn't the wherewithal. Rastus scratched his woolly poll, perplexedly, then queried:

"Don' yo' got no money 't 'all?"

"No," was the dejected reply.

"But it doan' cost yo' but 3 cents ter cross," insisted Rastus.

"I know; but I hain't got 3 cents."

After a final pondering, the ferryman remarked:

"I done tell yo' what: a man what ain't got 3 cents am jes' as well off on dis side of de ribber as on de odder!"—Lutheran Standard.

PREPAREDNESS. Grubbs—"Are you planning to make any good resolutions?"

Stubbs—"No, I am already pretty well stocked up in that way. You see, I never used those I made last year."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

THE Baptist Foreign Missionary Society is represented in the field by 705 missionaries, who are assisted in their work by 6,378 native workers in non-Christian lands and by 2,506 workers in Europe. During 102 years of missionary work the society has recorded 328,833 baptisms in non-Christian countries and 284,441 in Europe, of which 13,333 were recorded in 1915, the last year of complete records. There are now in the non-Christian fields 178,441 church members in 1,692 Baptist churches, of which 904, or 53 per cent., are self-supporting. The society maintains 27 hospitals and 52 dispensaries, which during the past year received 94,000 patients. The mission schools number 2,403, of which seven are colleges and 27 seminaries and training schools, the total enrolment exceeding 80,000. There are in the various missions 2,243 Sunday schools, with 86,000 pupils. The receipts of the society in its first year of work were $1,059. The receipts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1916, were $1,297,299.05.

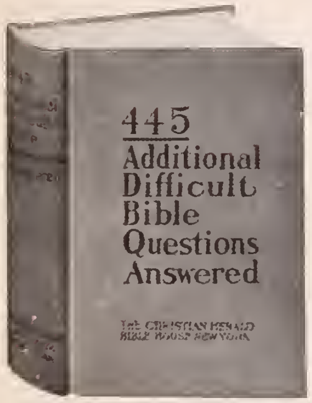
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES



WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

JUST DAVID

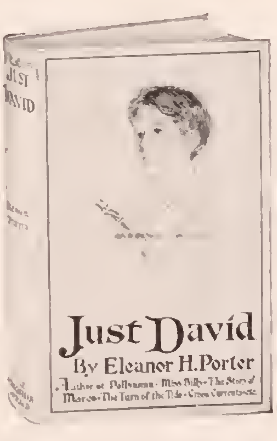
By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

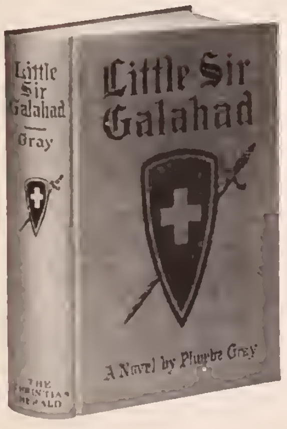
We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.



A STORY FOR THE FAMILY CIRCLE

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD



LITTLE SIR GALAHAD is a boy every bit as wonderful and with as high ideals as those of the ancient Knights, but he is an up-to-date hero and a very real little personage, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and, together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence, he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story.

"Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Lem Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate. There is much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story.

We will send "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

40,000 BEAUTIFUL QUOTATIONS

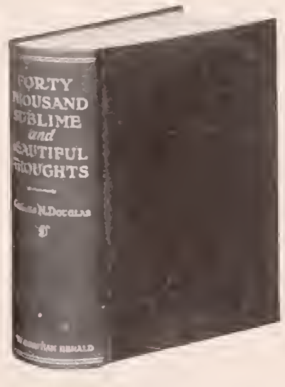
SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. It was a remarkable compilation, and it was used largely in public as well as private libraries.

In the course of time, the edition of this book became exhausted. We had so many inquiries for the work that we have republished it, thoroughly revised.

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of today, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to accomplish that result.

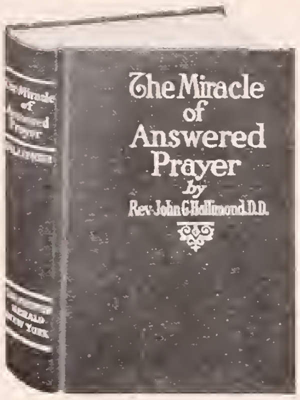
We will send "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.



THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D.D.



A Book With a Message for Every Soul

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands of every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish absolute evidence of the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to his followers: "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name He will give it you." "Ask, and it shall be given you. . . ."

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time—now—of answered prayers, all of which are presented in the name of Jesus, and submitted to the Divine Will. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

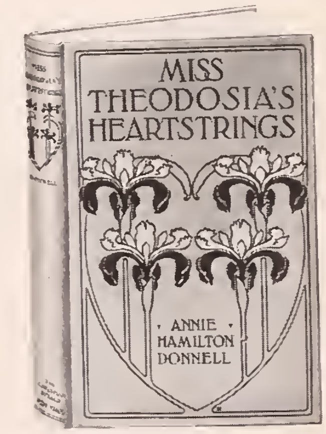
THEODOSIA'S HEARTSTRINGS

IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. What she found was a very much surprised child who was holding a baby on the small area of her knees. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest of the Flagg children, and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style. The thousands who have read her story about a little girl named Rebecca Mary, in the popular book bearing that title, will be all the more ready to love the irrepressible Evangeline, the ambitious Stefena, and the diminutive Elly Precious.

"Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings" is a book that no one who loves children can resist; the little Flaggs are a constant delight.

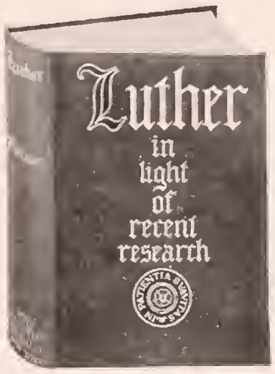
We will send a copy of "Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.



MARTIN LUTHER ANNIVERSARY BOOK

"Luther in Light of Recent Research"



WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has had the work translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book, which should be read by every Protestant in America, is supplemented by a series of eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

We will send the "Life of Luther," handsomely bound in cloth, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.75.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.

TWO BOOKS BY A FAMOUS PASTOR

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.

DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein, and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands, as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarefied atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of each volume to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Questions and Answers

J. J. V., Ovalo, Tex. Please explain Luke 11 : 24. "When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest; and finding none, he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out."

The passage is descriptive of the conflict between the devil, an unclean spirit, and a soul that craves deliverance. Two souls are described, that are converted—the one partially, the other wholly. The partially converted soul is emblematic of one who, though he throws the devil out, does not take Christ in. Hence, when the devil returns after wandering around looking for a good habitation, he finds an abode all cleaned out and swept and one in which there is no rival occupant. Thus, unless the converted soul, when it throws out the devil, replaces him with Christ, it runs the risk of having the devil find an unoccupied habitation and inhabiting it. In the case of the other soul described, this cannot be, because after the soul had cast out the unclean spirit, it had invited Christ in as the rightful occupant against whom the unclean spirit cannot prevail.

P. A. G., Grand Rapids, Mich. Please explain I Peter 3 : 19.

We have treated of this passage a number of times in the Mail-Bag and have discussed it at length in our "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered." One commentator says anent it: "The word 'preached' is not to be taken in the vague sense of making proclamation, showing Himself as bearing witness to Himself, far less in the sense of preaching judgment, but in the sense which it elsewhere has in the New Testament, where it occurs, both with the object expressed (e. g. the kingdom of God) and with the object unexpressed (e. g. Matt. 11 : 1; Mark 1 : 38) of Christ's earthly ministry of preaching, which was a message of grace. The word "spirits" is used here as in Heb. 12 : 23 in the sense of disembodied spirits. The phrase, "in prison," has the definite force which it has in II Pet. 2 : 4 and is not explained away as merely equivalent to "in safe keeping," or "in the world of the dead."

O. F., Bangor, Me. Many are indulging in conjecture as to whether, if Christ came back to earth today, He would enter church doors as little as He entered the Temple during His former sojourn on earth, or whether if He did enter, He would show preference for any one of the denominations. These are questions that no one can answer. Christ knows, as do many of us, that in all the denominations there are many good earnest souls who are doing the best they know with the light they have received. It is not our privilege to judge any one, and besides, a great wrong may be committed if we undertake to sit in judgment on others on what may be merely superficial evidence.

H. A. E., Manheim, Pa. Please explain I Cor. 2 : 5, 6, 10, 13–15.

These passages are characteristic of Paul, who labored to reconcile the rival claims of Reason and Revelation to be the supreme guide to the discovery of what man needs for the regulation of his life and the attainment of the highest bliss. He recognizes that man, before he has acquired grace, is of a different composition, as it were. He does not see things in the same light; he does not have the same understanding; he does not feel about them as he does after he has seen the light of the Gospel. Therefore many problems are as much hidden to him spiritually, as material problems would be to a physically blinded one. But when God commands the light to shine out of the darkness into our hearts, we begin to get the spiritual illumination, and to breathe the air and taste the joy of the wider vision, which enables us to see everything in its true light. We seem to dwell in an entirely new atmosphere with those who, like ourselves, have received spiritual enlightenment.

J. R. T., Montross, Va. Prayer may be either audible or silent. The soul does not always express itself in audible language. We have seen a whole congregation in silent prayer, and who shall say that the voiceless petitions from such a gathering are not heard and accepted at the throne of God? If, however, the teachers you mention hold that audible prayer by a sinner is wrong, and that God will not listen to such prayers, we should regard such a statement as showing ignorance of Bible teaching on the subject. Ever since men in the days of Enos first "began to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. 4 : 26), the soul of man has striven toward God in prayer and praise through the language of the lips. The whole Bible is full of audible prayer by saints and even by sinners. As for the statement that "God will not hear a sinner's prayer," it is utterly unwarranted. His ear is ever open to the cry of the repentant one, and he is ready to forgive all who come to him in a contrite spirit. There is joy in heaven over "one sinner that repenteth," we read in Scripture, whether the prayer of such an one be spoken or silent. God has the power to forgive even before we ask forgiveness; moreover, he is so gracious and merciful that where sinners are truly contrite "it shall come to pass that before they call, I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear."

B. F. M., Oceanside, Calif. The official title of the Authorized or King James Version bears the words "Appointed to be read in churches." It also states that the translation was made by "His Majesty's special command."

A. B., Watertown, Wis. The Armenian Christians have no connection whatever with either the Roman Catholic or the Greek Catholic churches. The Armenian church has an unbroken history from apostolic times, and has existed as a separate church practically through all the history of Christianity. The Turks are not fighting the Armenian Church because of its political activities. They hate the Armenians because of their Christianity, and are attempting to force them to come under the banner of Islam in the same way in which they have made "conversions" of other peoples in times past. The faith of the Armenians is, however, so well rooted that as a people they prefer to die rather than deny Christ. No other people is more worthy of the help of the Christians of America. Through many centuries they have borne persecutions and yet have kept the faith, and even today, in the midst of a persecution worse than any that has gone before, they are still holding fast to the faith and dying for it. The first record of any monarch and people becoming Christians at one time occurred in the early history of the church at Edessa in Armenia, when the king and all his people were baptized under apostolic teaching.

Mrs. C. B. P., Oskaloosa, Iowa. What did Agrippa mean by the word "Christian" in the passage, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (Acts 26 : 28)?

The word "Christian" here is used by Agrippa as denoting the sect to which Paul belonged, as opposed to the Jews. From the use of the term "Christian" by the king, it would seem that the appellation had become generally used in speaking of the followers of Jesus of Nazareth. The word then still had that restricted meaning, but was much more expressive than the word "Christian" at the present time, when every one is called a Christian who is not heathen, Jew or Mohammedan, irrespective of whether such a one is a believer and follower of Christ or not.

I Can Do All Things

EACH new year is a challenge to live a better life. Almost every one accepts the challenge. New resolutions are the order of the day.

"No more drink for me," says one. "I always said I could stop when I wanted to, and I can. One more evening of it, and then I quit for good for the New Year."

"I can make good in the New Year," says another. "Somehow I did not quite make the best of my opportunities in the last year,—too many side attractions, I guess. Anyway, I can buckle down if I want to, and in the New Year I am going to make good."

"I know I can be a decenter man," says another, "and in this New Year I am going to be. There will be less gloom around my home. I won't shirk my share of the church work. I'll have a smile and a warm handshake for the other man. I can do it, and I will."

"No more debts for me," says another. "I can live within my income. I am tired of this getting behind all the time. I can pay as I go, and in the New Year I shall keep out of debt."

And so it goes. With a fine air of determination and seemingly expecting the world to break into applause in advance as though the New Year's record had already been achieved, we turn our backs upon the sorry months that have fled, and with a proud "I can do all things," face the future.

Alas!

But others there are who also recognize the errors of the past year and have visions of better things in the year to come, who bravely confess their defeats, who wisely admit their weaknesses, and who, without self-importance and self-confidence, face the New Year with great determination, with strong resolution saying firmly to their souls as they set the goal for 1917:

"I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me!"

Very touching are some of the thoughts in this letter from M. I. D., a reader in Roseisle, Manitoba: "I am sending for another copy of your paper of August 16. I want the story about the Poet Riley. All the boys in my husband's camp in England love the Christian Herald, and I always forward my copy to them. The dear soldier lads want it. I was born in New Jersey, and I'm a Canadian soldier's wife now. He's in camp in England, waiting to be sent to France. Although living up here, I'm still a true American at heart, and love the dear old Stars and Stripes, and wonder if they mean as much to everyone who still lives there as they do to me. I'm proud of your paper that comes from dear New York, and which has the reputation of being the most popular newspaper in the world. If I were only rich enough I'd take fifty subscriptions to send to the lads in the trenches; but as it is I can only do my bit and send mine. My sister's husband is already in France, and my brother goes over this next week, and he's not eighteen till November, either; so you see the war touches us all. Please pray that it may soon end."

A. L., Maconville, Ia., writes: "I am a farmer. We have lost our corn crop for two years, hiring money at the bank rate of 8 per cent. to tide over the famine prices. In this world the big fish eat the little fish, as in the famine of old." All the ills of human society cannot be cured over night. Our friend suffers from a form of greed or perhaps of business necessity that is widespread and not confined to agricultural districts. The Rural Credits Bill which was passed by Congress is, of course, designed to lessen the very evil of which he complains. Most of us have still to learn the art of extracting a blessing out of every seeming disaster. Nevertheless, the blessing is actually there.

Christ's Humble Servant, Quakerstown, Pa. You are right in your supposition that if the church of Christ and its members followed the Master there would be need neither of war nor preparedness. But those are matters now unhappily beyond our comprehension, as it would seem, since many so-called Christian nations are engaged in the most terrible war in the history of the world, and other nominally Christian nations are preparing to meet possible and probable war conditions. All we can do about it at the present time is to put our faith implicitly into "Thy will be done," remembering that though God may withdraw his hand for a space and leave man to work out the results of his own wickedness, God still rules, and will make an end in his own good time. As to the other phase of your question, we have ever insisted on that interpretation of the Sabbath observance question that allows for works of necessity, and these, to a conscientious mind, cannot be difficult to determine.

Reader, Springfield, S. D. 1. Did God make more than one wife for Adam? 2. Did Jacob really want more than Rachel? 3. Did Abraham want another wife during Sarah's lifetime?

1. There is a Jewish legend that, before Eve, a woman, Lilith, was created in the same way, thus accounting for a man's ribs being equal; but this has no Scriptural warrant. 2. Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and when he was given Leah instead he served for Rachel seven years more. There is no indication that he wanted more than Rachel. 3. There is no evidence that he did. Back of these three questions there seems to lie an unspoken inquiry as to the Scriptural status of polygamy. Polygamy is recorded in the Scriptures, but nowhere is there divine sanction of it. The original marriage law is (Gen. 2 : 24): "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh." Here we have marriage conceived of as the closest union that can exist: two persons blending their personalities together. Paul likens the relation to that of Christ and the church; the husband is to love the wife and the wife the husband as if they actually formed one body. Such marriage precludes polygamy.

Rev. and Mrs. W. A. Sunday

BABYLON was great, but God Almighty was greater. Babylon sinned, and for its sins paid the penalty of ultimate destruction. Many people have held New York to be a modern Babylon. That this is somewhat of a false charge need scarcely be asserted. But New York is the greatest melting-pot, the greatest mixture of good and bad, of conflicting elements and harmonizing forces, on the American continent. This polyglot mixture has its aspirations, its hopes, its successes, its defeats, its worship and its sin. It also has multiplied numbers of people who have once borne some definite relation to some religious body and since coming to the metropolis have not identified themselves with any church or with any movement Godward. They are not, perhaps, quite what the Methodists call "backsliders," but though they may be religious, they are not working at it. And for a number of years a few earnest souls have been praying and working for a real revival in New York City. For many months a committee made earnest efforts to convince Evangelist William A. Sunday that it was God's will that he should lead the revival that was to be. The efforts and plan in this connection have been given full publicity in earlier issues of the Christian Herald. The Sunday campaign has now been definitely fixed for the months of April, May and June, 1917. The site has been selected for the tabernacle, which is an essential part of every Sunday campaign. A thoroughly enthusiastic and well-organized committee has been chosen, and as the year 1916 closes, the plans for the big revival are already taking definite shape.

To a great many people Billy Sunday is an acrobatic sort of person who takes great liberties with the English language and has some peculiar hypnotic power by which he induces otherwise normal and rational beings to rush down a sawdust-carpeted trail, grasp the hand of the evangelist, and sign a card. But this is a very superficial view of the work done by this evangelist. His language is characteristic. A great many people praise God for that fact. But his message is the same old message that has been the power of God to the salvation of souls ever since the day of Pentecost.

The stream of people sweeping down the sawdust trail to grasp the hand of the evangelist is not, in the first place, the result of personal magnetism or of rhetorical hypnotism, but of downright hard work, much of it, very much indeed, done before the doors of the tabernacle open for the first meeting of the formal campaign. Evangelist Sunday is now holding meetings in Boston, and the meetings are proving remarkably successful even for a Sunday campaign, due, as the evangelist and his party are frank to state, in large part to the excellent work of preparation done by the local committee in Boston under the direction of members of the Sunday party. The same preparation is now being begun in New York City. But beyond question the real impelling force behind the host of "trail-hitters" is the same divine power that swept three thousand penitent souls into the Kingdom under Peter's preaching.

The members of the New York committee and the workers associated with them met at luncheon at the Hotel Astor on December 11, over a thousand persons in all. Each member of the Sunday party outlined his or her own part of the work and those present realized when the meeting was over just what sort of a campaign was in prospect. They learned that every evangelical church in New York had been assigned its part in relation to the whole work, and the different neighborhoods had been plotted as to their religious needs and difficulties. The great tabernacle is to be built at One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Street and Broadway on the site of the old American League baseball park. The site is accessible by surface line and subway from all parts of the Bronx and Manhattan. The tabernacle will seat 20,000 persons, and provision is to be made for a choir of from three to five thousand, from which will be organized two mixed sections and a male chorus, all being together on Sundays and special days, the burden of the other services being divided. This great choir will be under the charge of Homer Rodeheaver. Until the campaign begins it is to be trained, as they said at the meeting on Monday, by the best musician available in New York.

The general committee is headed by James M. Speers, a business man who always finds time to do effective service for the Kingdom at the same time that he makes a success of a great mercantile business. The "New York William A. Sunday Evangelistic Association, Inc.," was formally chartered on December 14. The incorporators include James M. Speers, George Arnold, William B. Millar, Bishop Fallows, Charles L. Goodell, Henry W. Jessup, Jordan L. Mott, Alexander M. Hadden, Eben E. Olcott, William Jay Schieffelin, Stephen Baker, F. M. Olyphant, and John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

It is planned to divide the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx into twenty districts, subdivide these into sections and the sections into blocks, coinciding more or less closely with the present city blocks. Each district and section will be under the charge of a committee, and each block will be in charge of a committee of three or four church people, whose first business it will be to visit every family in the block and to know just what is the religious condition of the block. Then, for six weeks before the tabernacle campaign begins, these committees will be responsible for neighborhood prayer meetings within the block, to which they are to invite every resident. These meetings will be held on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, lasting for half an hour. In Boston there were a thousand neighborhood prayer meetings, and the work was so well done that 200 persons were led to Christ in these meetings before the tabernacle campaign was opened, and the pressure for a men's meeting was so great that a special one was held on the first Thursday of the campaign, at which more than 1,000 men took a stand for Christ. These neighborhood Bible classes are depended upon to break down the apathy of former church members and to waken the conscience of those who have never definitely accepted Christ as their Saviour. What is more, these meetings are expected to prepare church members for definite personal work before, during and after the Sunday campaign.

A "hospital" is a gracious auxiliary of the Sunday tabernacles. Physicians, nurses and all necessary equipment are at hand to minister quickly to any who, among the great audiences, are taken ill

During the tabernacle campaign meetings will be held at churches nearest to the high schools for both girls and boys of high school age. Similar meetings will also be held in preparatory schools and colleges. The schools and colleges around Boston have thrown their doors wide open to this phase of the campaign, and a great many of the students have been brought to Christ. The business women will be organized. Meetings lasting such time as is available will be held in the department stores, factories, business offices, and wherever employers are willing and the girls wish it. These meetings will be managed by a committee of New York women.

Similar meetings for men to those held for the women are held in every shop, warehouse and store where men are employed, and shop Bible classes are organized. The aim in New York is to have 50,000 men in 500 Bible classes during the campaign. Out of these men's Bible classes is expected to come much of the permanent work, for they are expected to continue after the campaign is closed and to help to strengthen converts and to train them for aggressive Christian work.

The scheme of the Sunday campaign is summed up in the words "preparation, production and conservation." As an evidence of the conserving force 1,000 converts of the Philadelphia campaign will come to New York on January 14 for the formal opening of the preparatory work of the New York campaign. They will be divided into 250 teams, who will speak morning and evening, thus serving 500 churches. The teams are to be made up, according to one of the Sunday party, of one good old church man made over, two trail-hitters, and a Bible-class leader. The message which Sunday sent to the Astor Hotel gathering was that he could not succeed without the cooperation of the church people, but if the people would waken to their opportunity, New York might see a real Pentecost.

Mrs. Sunday, speaking for her husband at the luncheon, said: "Mr. Sunday looks on the coming New York campaign as the call of God. If he did not believe that implicitly he would never have consented to come here. New York seems to be ready for a great revival, and I hope and pray that thousands may be led to a new life of usefulness."

George Sunday, eldest son of the evangelist, is in charge of the general campaign work for New York.

The Public and the Peace Proposal

THE press of all countries reflects a wide difference of opinion both as to the real character of the recent peace move by Germany and the probable effect it will have upon the course of the war. Naturally, there are many who profess to see in the peace proposal everything but sincerity. On one hand it is regarded as intended solely to impress neutrals with the peaceable disposition of the Central Powers. On the other hand, it is taken as a sign of internal weakness in Germany, indicating that, despite successes on the field of battle, financial and food considerations within the empire are bringing Germany to a point where her military forces will not suffice. Still by others it is claimed that the intention of Germany is to bring about dissension among her allied enemies and thus prevent unity of action against her. Others contend that Germany cannot possibly believe that peace negotiations will be undertaken at this time, and consequently her object is solely to place the responsibility for continued bloodshed upon England and her allies. But as against these various skeptical views, the real weight of public opinion is on the side of those who believe the peace overtures to have been made from no such motives as these that have been outlined, but entirely from a belief that peace on terms satisfactory to all belligerents is possible now.

It is not expected that hostilities will instantly cease, or that an armistice will be at once declared. But that England and her allies must give serious consideration to the proposals, is urged on all sides. If what has been done does not really open the way to peace, it does afford the Allies an opportunity that cannot be ignored to lay before the world in a reply to the Teutonic Powers the basis upon which England, France, Russia and Italy will discuss peace. And it is apparent from editorials and news dispatches that the great mass of the public look for this as the first outcome of the action taken at Berlin. Even in Berlin itself, the public is reserved in its expectations, and realizes that the tremendous conflict will not be stayed nor the waste of life diminished unless the Allies make counter-proposals which will admit of a compromise basis of negotiations.

As a matter of fact, at this writing, the public is in entire ignorance of the actual terms which Germany proposes as a basis for peace. But whatever the facts in the case, the public takes it for granted that far more will be demanded by each side of the belligerents than they hope to secure in a final peace settlement. And the consensus of opinion seems to be that unless the terms submitted by Germany are beyond all question impossible, the Allies should and doubtless will show a willingness to enter now upon the first phase of a definite peace.

WHILE public opinion everywhere, as reflected by the daily press, is as yet unsettled, deep significance lies in the steady trend toward negotiations. There is a fast-swelling tide of hopefulness.

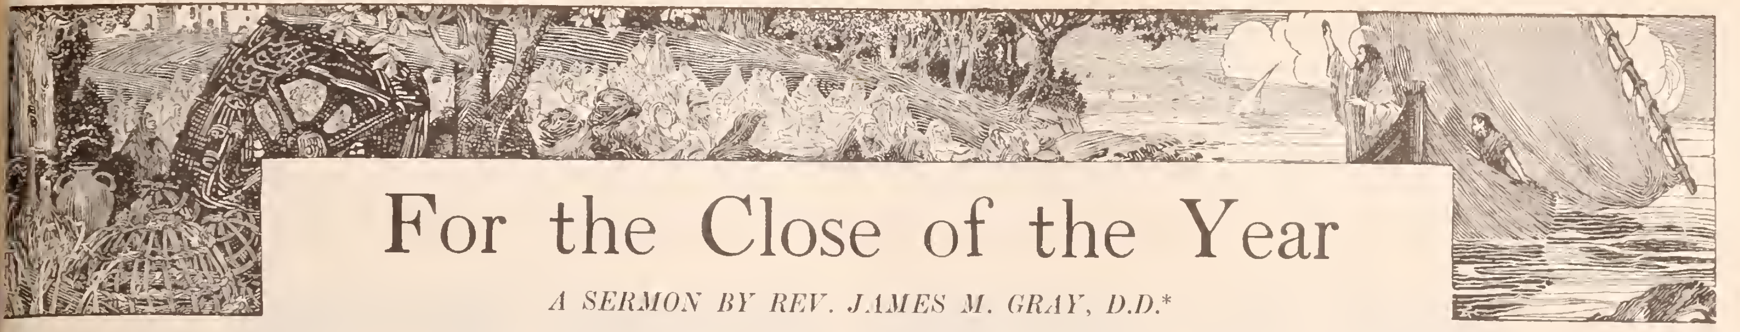
In the first days following the issue of the German proposal, leading dailies of this country, as well as those of England and France, met it with skepticism, not to say derision. Most of these papers have ceased their open opposition, and many have entirely changed front, shifting to the side of negotiation.

The confusion at first was largely due to a false and fictitious story purporting to come from Germany and outlining what was said to be Germany's terms, unofficially given out. Upon these suggested terms the larger force of the opposition was founded. These terms were pronounced a "trick" on the part of Germany, designed to separate the Entente Allies. But later information disclosed that no terms have been proposed, or suggested, even unofficially. All that Germany asks is a peace parley. The New York World, which at first could see no prospect of negotiation, has gained a clearer view: "In so far as Germany only asks for a conference, there seems to be no valid ground upon which such a request can be refused. A conference would develop Germany's terms for peace, but it would also develop the Allies' terms for peace, and if both are definitely formulated it will be the easier to determine whether a continuance of the war is worth the price that must be paid." The New York Times, while still assuming that only such terms as Great Britain may propose can prevail, no longer protests against negotiations.

In Great Britain, Andrew Bonar Law, the new chancellor of the exchequer, stated in Parliament that Britain's only terms will be: "Adequate reparation for the past and adequate security for the future." In France the new premier, Briand, accompanied his denunciation of the German peace offer as a "trap" with an announcement that he would ask for increased power with which to carry on the war. But in England as in France the press is taking on a more pacific tone. The Manchester Guardian, perhaps the truest spokesman of English thought, says: "Let us be as resolute as the case demands in the terms upon which we deem it necessary to insist, but let it never be said that we refused in mere insolence or levity to listen to the very name of peace."

ONE of the strongest arguments held forth against peace at present has lain in the cry of "Prussian militarism." Surprising and clarifying, then, is the official announcement said to be authorized by the German embassy at Washington, that one of the most important subjects for discussion at the proposed conference of belligerents would be that of limited universal disarmament.

President Wilson seems not likely at present to go beyond the point of acting as an intermediary in transmitting the peace proposal to the Allied powers. But the feeling of a very large number of the Christian people of this country is emphasized in the following resolution adopted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, representing 140,000 churches: "Resolved: That the general secretary of the Federal Council be instructed to request the Christian people of this country in their public and private worship during the ensuing Christmas season to make earnest prayer for the promotion of Christian fellowship and permanent peace among all the peoples of the world."



For the Close of the Year

*A SERMON BY REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

TEXT—1 Sam. 20: 3. "There is but a step between me and ath."

DAVID was mistaken when he spake these words to his dear friend Jonathan. To be sure, he was greatly put to it for his life. Jonathan's father, king Saul, was hunting nd persecuting him in every place. Three times ad he barely escaped the point of Saul's javelin. But hat of it? Had not the God of Truth, whom he erved, sworn unto him that he would sit on the hrone of Israel? And was he not able to perform that hich he had promised?

No, David, it was a lack of faith on thy part to peak thus. And yet it would not be a lack of faith n our part to do the same. Who of us has a specific romise of life beyond the present moment? Some ise man has likened the individual's existence to rawing water from a concealed reservoir whose esources are absolutely unknown. The supply may ast a long while, and yet the next draught may xhaust it. One can only wait and see.

In the light of this fact should not our daily conduct e qualified and softened just a little? If we were to ie tonight, how sorry some of us would be for some f the uncharitable thoughts we have harbored, the ard speeches we have expressed and the disagreeable nd hurtful things we have done! How we would ike to know we were forgiven! How we would like o call to our bedside some one far away, and say a ord of explanation or conciliation that we have ailed to say! Is it a deed of kindness we should have one? A neighborly lift we might have given? An onest debt that should have been paid? A wrong of ome kind made right? Oh, it never will be done now. How sad, how sad!

And when you come to think of it further, though ou may live to do this thing, the other party may not ive. There is but a step between him and death, as well as you. Your disposition in this matter may hange, but he will be beyond your reach. Why not do it now?

"What use for the rope if it be not flung Till the swimmer's grasp to the rock has clung?
What help in a comrade's bugle blast
When the peril of Alpine height is past?
What need that the spurring pæan roll
When the runner is safe beyond the goal?
What worth in eulogy's blandest breath
When whispered in ears that are hushed in death?
No! If you have only a word of cheer,
Speak it while I am alive to hear!"

IF "there is but a step between me and death," then is there not some adjustment of my temporal affairs which it is desirable for me to make? What about a future provision for those dependent on me? We may not be able to lay by very much in the savings bank; but what about life insurance of some kind? "Is it wrong for a Christian to insure his life?" is a question sometimes asked, but it is difficult to see how it can be wrong. Paul wrote to Timothy that "If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." Life insurance was not in his mind, of course; but does it not look as though the principle was there?

And then here is another adjustment to be made. Some time ago there was a sale of autographs in Paris, and two men, one much younger than the other, bid actively against each other for the possession of a certain letter. The younger at length obtained it at a high price; when the older, approaching him, said: "Sir, I only wanted that to destroy it, for it compromises a man who was my friend." To which the younger, with tears of gratitude in his eyes, replied: "And, sir, I desired it for the same reason; for its author was my father."

Have you any writing in your possession that ought to be put out of the way? It may not benefit any one in the least; yet its publicity after your decease may work a good deal of mischief to perfectly innocent people. You will seriously consider this, if you are a right-thinking man, not to say a Christian.

And what about making your will? Tiffey was right when he told David Copperfield: "There is no subject on which men are so inconsistent and so little to be trusted as that of making their wills." The interest of the pulpit in this matter lies in the fact that the Lord's cause depends so much on the wise and liberal benefactions of those on whom he has bestowed wealth. And by the Lord's cause is meant not merely interests social, educational and charitable, but those distinctively evangelical. The rich people of the world will give for research in hygiene and sanitation, and for the promotion of secular schools and colleges; but the redeemed should give to promote the knowledge of redemption and glorify the Redeemer. It is lamentable for a professing Christian to have lived a lifetime without applying any appreciable portion of his income to advance the Gospel; but for him to die in the neglect of it shows not only a lack of interest, but a lack of faith.

IN the next place, if "there is but a step between me and death," should it not diminish my concern and limit my love for the present world? By this is meant the aims and methods, the spirit and the motives of the world as evinced in its business, its pleasures, its customs and its ambitions. Alas! how many are altogether overborne by these things, to the neglect of that better part which can not be taken away!

Today Is Mine

By

Louis E. Orcutt

THE past is gone, the future still to come.
  Today is here.
 From early sun till midnight's bell, clear rung,
This day is mine.

THE past is dead, its efforts, plans, results
  Are written down.
The future calls. The siren lures me on!
  Today is mine.
In this today, this day now all my own,
  I start anew.
No law of chance, no mem'ry binds me down.
  The day is mine.

If all the shattered buildings of my dreams
  Lie at my feet,
The ruins give me footing—farther reach
  Today is mine.
If the high tide of full reward proclaims
  My sure success,
The world forgets. New laurels must be won.
  Today is mine.

THE past is gone. The future still to be God watches o'er.
Oh, may I not forget that through his grace
  Today is mine!

Think of its foolishness. "This night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall these things be which thou hast provided?"

And not only its foolishness, but its peril. As a heathen moralist once said, we are like passengers whose ship has gone into port for a few hours, and while wind and tide favor, and the pilot calls us to come aboard, we are loitering on the shore, gathering shells and pebbles until the ship sets sail without us.

We need not be an ascetic like John the Baptist, a misanthrope like Jonah, a melancholic like Hezekiah, turning our face to the wall, and chattering like a crane or a swallow at the thought of death; but why be an Esau, selling our birthright for a mess of pottage?

Let us enjoy life, and value it as God's present blessing to us. Let us be truly interested in it, out of regard to him. Let us seek to prolong our life as a Christian duty, and to improve ourselves physically, intellectually, socially, financially, in every legitimate way open to a Christian. But let us be the Christian in the whole of it! Let us remember that "the world passeth away and the lust thereof," and that "the love of the Father is not in him" who loveth the world —that is, who loveth the world more than he loveth the Father.

In the fourth place, if there is but a step between me and death, am I prepared to take it?

DEATH is a disagreeable experience to anticipate. Have you ever met a sane person who liked it? Does not our whole being shrink back at the thought of it?

But why? Physical suffering? No; many die without pain. They are unconscious at the moment, or they are graciously and almost miraculously sustained by divine power.

Is it perplexity and doubt as to what is beyond? No, an unseen Hand has provided for us here, and it is presumable that he will not desert us there. If we were welcomed into this world, why not into that which is to come? If foresight and preparation anticipated our advent on earth, why not have the same confidence as to our advent somewhere else?

No, "the sting of death is sin," and that is why men abhor it. They are not troubled at the thought that "it is appointed unto men once to die," but that after this is the judgment.

"Ay, there's the rub!
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause."

But just here comes in the thought of Jesus Christ, who came into the world to "deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

One summer day, a farmer up in the country got stung by a bee and I went to comfort him. "Well," said he, "there's one thing that brings me a good deal of satisfaction anyway; that bee'll never sting another man!" "Why," I replied, "did you kill it?" "No," said he, "but don't you know that a bee has only one sting, and that when it stings a man, it leaves the sting in him?"

That fact of natural history had escaped me, but it was brought to my attention just in time to apply it to my farmer friend, who was unsaved.

Let me apply it now. "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." He tasted death for every man. "All we, like sheep, have gone astray, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

Death may alight on such an one, but there is no sting in it for him. Its power to torment is gone. It is no longer the jailer of the grave, but the porter that opens the gates of paradise.

BUT what is it to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ? Oh, what a vital question this is, and how many there are who want it answered! "If I only knew how to believe!" is the expression of so many anxious hearts.

But to believe in this sense is to commit. It is just to trust God to do what he has promised to do through his Son Jesus Christ. Only the commitment wants to be definite, absolute, and irreversible. Just say to him, "My God, I am the sinner that Jesus came to save. I now receive him as my Saviour, and by thy grace I will henceforth confess and follow him as my Lord." That is the first step, but it is a supreme one. If truly taken, it means a passage from death unto life. This old year will not have passed and a new one have begun any more really than the old things of your life will have passed and all things will have become new, if you take this step.

Some three years ago an ocean freighter was burned at sea. It was in the midst of a great storm; and while several vessels came to her assistance, none was able successfully to launch a boat to save her crew. When the end was near, the captain signaled, "Can nothing be done to help us? The ship must be abandoned. Her plates are buckling. Stand close, as I may have to jump for it."

He "jumped for it," and he was picked up and saved. Jesus Christ is standing close today. Trust him to pick you up if you make the jump.

WILL HUNT FOR A CORNER IN FOODS. Federal investigation into the high cost of living was instituted on December 9, when Attorney General Gregory ordered grand jury investigations in New York and Detroit, announcing that similar action would be taken in Cleveland, Kansas City, St. Louis, Minneapolis and other cities. A mass of detailed information from the Department of Agriculture has been turned over to the special investigator, District Attorney George W. Anderson of Boston. The Department of Justice has also accumulated considerable evidence regarding combinations of foodstuff dealers, and all of this evidence has been turned over to the local grand juries. The President is said to be urging the utmost thoroughness in the investigation.

STATE DEPARTMENT KEEPS BUSY. It was announced on December 11 that information assembled at the State Department, regarding the sinking of the British steamer Marina, in which six American lives were lost, had been forwarded to Berlin for submission to the German Foreign Office; also that Washington had asked the British government to furnish any evidence it might have to prove that the steamship Arabia, torpedoed without warning, was not a transport. Germany has indicated that if her submarine commanders were proved at fault in these two cases, she would make proper reparation; but she requested evidence in possession of the American government. On December 11 it was reported that the State Department had for the third time asked Great Britain and France for a safe conduct for Count Tarnowski, the new Austrian ambassador to the United States.

NEW TERRORS OF THE SEA. The General Board of the Navy has recommended to Congress the construction, as the next element in the greater navy, of four 42,000-ton battleships, to have a speed of twenty-three knots, and to mount twelve 16-inch guns, the total cost of each being $26,000,000. The four battleships for which contracts were recently let displace 32,600 tons each, and mount eight 16-inch guns. The new battleships, if authorized, will be the most powerful as yet planned by any navy, and will be as large as the locks of the Panama Canal will permit.

THE THINNING RANKS. According to the report of the Pension Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, there were on that date 352,277 soldiers of the Civil War drawing pensions, a decrease of 34,000 in the year. There were also 287,753, a decrease of 3,354, widows of Civil War soldiers drawing pensions. There are still on the pension rolls 115 widows of soldiers of the War of 1812, 513 soldiers and 3,785 widows of soldiers of the Mexican War. In 1898 there were 745,822 Civil War soldiers drawing pensions. From July 1, 1790, to July 1, 1916, the government had paid for pensions $5,054,630,727. The total war bill of the government since 1789 for both army and navy has been $10,891,184,859, which includes the Pension Account.

MAPS AT COST. The Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior has completed nearly half of the accurate topographic surveys authorized by Congress in 1882. The surveys show all roads, rivers, hills, elevations and peculiar formations in given areas. The maps are distributed at the actual cost of printing by the Geological Survey.

ONLY A FEW FARMS LEFT FOR DISTRIBUTION. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, 20,000,000 acres passed from the public domain into the hands of private owners, a gain of 3,000,000 over the previous year. Of the 250,000,000 acres of public land still held by the United States, much is in the arid regions and not at present available for homestead purposes.

Athens, capital of Greece and possibly the next storm center of the war

PUTTING CHICAGO UNDER GROUND. Chicago, which for many years has had many of the appurtenances of metropolitan life, such as surface cars, elevated railways, insufficient terminals, questionable politics and police scandals, is now to complete the list by constructing a subway. A commission of three eminent engineers has made an exhaustive investigation, and has suggested a feasible plan for the solution of the "loop problem." The plan calls for the expenditure of a little over $96,000,000 in nine years, and for the expenditure of a total of $260,000,000 by 1950. Chicago has not yet taken steps to make the plan effective, but necessity is driving the city to action.

ABOUT MAGAZINE POSTAGE. The House Committee on Post Offices on December 9 included in the bill to be presented to the House shortly an amendment by Representative Randa of California whic would establis second-class posta rates by zones a follows: local, first second and thir zones, under 30 miles, one cent pound; fourth zone 300–600 miles, tw cents a pound; fift zone, 600 to 1,00 miles, three cents pound; sixth zone 1,000 to 1,400 miles four cents a pound seventh zone, 1,400 1,800 miles, fiv cents a pound eighth zone, mor than 1,800 miles six cents a pound. The new rates woul apply to "all newspapers, magazine and other publications regularly admitted to the mails as matter of th second class," and Mr. Randall estimates that the average postage o magazines of national circulation wil be about two and one-half cents pound, which will be two and one-half times the present rate Postage is now a large element in the expense of producing magazines, and such an increase as thi would inevitably force increase in subscription rates or decrease in the size and weight of magazines. The bill also proposes a local postage rate of one cent on letters.

DRYING THE ONION'S TEARS Laboratories at Bound Brook N. J., under governmental supervision, are said to have developed a process of preserving vegetables by drying them, which is superio to any form of preserving now in use. The process subjects the sliced vegetables to a comparatively low temperature in air kep in circulation, gradually drawing out ninety-five per cent. of the moisture. A few minutes in water is said to restore the slices to the appearance and flavor o fresh-picked produce, slices o onion receiving back their well-known odor and pungent flavor The process is said to be less expensive than cooking and to prevent spoiling because the bacteria which cause fermentation and rotting require moisture to work in.

NEW WARDEN OF SING SING. On December 6 the State Prison Department of New York announced the appointment of William H. Moyer, for twelve years warden of the Federa Penitentiary at Atlanta, to succeed Thomas Mott Osborne as warden of Sing Sing Prison. Mr. Moyer has been recognized as a reform warden, although a strict disciplinarian, and is expected to conserve the best elements of the Osborne régime.

THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION AGAIN. It was announced on December 11 that President Wilson had definitely declared that he would veto an immigration bill containing the literacy test. At the time the announcement was made it appeared probable that the bill would be passed through Congress regardless of the veto threat.

DECISIONS REGARDING TRANSPORTATION. The Supreme Court on December 4 upheld the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission permitting railroads to give lower transcontinental freight rates to Pacific ports than to inland cities. On December 11 the Rushing the Eight-Hour Case. 'he Adamson eight-hour case has been laced at the head of the calendar of the upreme Court for January 8. It is umored that the railways and their mployees are getting together on a new aw to be recommended by both em-loyers and employees to replace both he Adamson law and the proposed ompulsory arbitration law.

Congress to Raise Wages. It was nnounced on December 10 that the ppropriations Committee of the House f Representatives would recommend to 'ongress the raising of the salaries of ll employees of the government receiving $1,800 a year or less, the inreases to range from fifty to one hundred nd fifty dollars a year. Wage inreases continue to be announced in ndustrial plants. The Willys-Overland utomobile Company on December 8 nnounced increases aggregating $1,-50,000 a year, affecting 21,000 em-loyees. Similar increases have been iven by various cotton mills, shoe actories and steel works in different arts of the country.

For a Dry Nation. The Judiciary 'ommittee of the House of Representa-ives on December 14 reported favor-bly the resolution for a national pro-ibition amendment. The resolution roposing the amendment known as the usan B. Anthony amendment for ational woman suffrage was reported vithout recommendation, and was laced on the calendar of the House.

Fragments of News. Great is civilization. The Society Islands are to have heir first brewery. A plant, to be built argely of American materials and to ave a daily capacity of fifteen barrels, s to be established to supply the demand or beer created by the American export rade. . . The War Department nnounced on December 8 that 6,000 more national guardsmen, now on the Mexican border, would be returned to heir homes and mustered out. . . . The 60,000 men's clothing workers in New York went on strike December 13. They want two dollars more a week and a reduction from fifty to forty-eight hours. . . . A fire in the Canadian factory of the Quaker Oats Company at Peterboro, Ontario, December 11, caused property damage of about $1,000,000 and cost eight lives. . . . Orville Wright announced on December 9 that he had perfected a new stabilizer for aeroplanes that does not operate on the gyroscopic principle. . . . Field Marshal Prince Iwao Oyama, commander-in-chief of the Manchurian army of Japan in the Russo-Japanese War, died on December 10. . . . Madison Square Garden has been sold under mortgage to the New York Life Insurance Company, principal mortgagee, for $2 000 000. The Insurance Company has offered it for sale. . . . In the interests of fresh air, New York indulged in an open-window week, December 3–10. In addition to urging open windows, the Board of Health advised people to walk to work, and the culminating event of the week was an eight-mile hike participated in by 700 men and women. The motive for this effort at this time was the fact that with the coming of fall and the season of artificial heat there is an immediate increase in all pulmonary diseases due to insufficient ventilation. . . . The Immigration Bill with the literacy clause included was passed by the Senate December 14 and went to conference. . . . The United States transport Sumner, which went ashore in a fog off Barnegat, N. J., on December 12, will be floated. . . . United States submarine H-3 also went ashore in a fog near Eureka, Calif., December 14, the crew of twenty-six being rescued by breeches buoy.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE most important event, looked at from any standpoint, in the past week has been the official announcement by the Teutonic allies that they are ready to make peace, but this is more fully treated elsewhere in this number.

The responsible government in France has now been vested in an inner cabinet of five members, comprising M. Briand, M. Ribot, M. Thomas, all sufficiently well known, General Lyautey, and Admiral Lacaze. The first act of the new government was to effect changes in the command of the French armies, which resulted in General Joffre's being left with the title of commander-in-chief of the French armies, but removed from active command and made "Technical Counsel on Military Affairs." General Nivelle becomes commander-in-chief of the Armies of the North and Northeast (what we call the western front), while General Sarrail remains for the moment at least commander-in-chief of the Army of the Orient (Macedonia, Greece, etc.) but both under and directly responsible to the minister of war, and not to the nominal commander-in-chief of the French armies.

Mr. Lloyd-George has been slightly ill during the past week, and hence his first meeting with Parliament as premier and to a large extent dictator had to be postponed until Tuesday, December 19. The definite announcement of the government Mr. Lloyd-George had succeeded in forming was made on December 9. As in France, there is an inner council responsible for all things connected with the war, which includes Lloyd-George himself, Lords Milner and Curzon, Arthur Henderson and Andrew Bonar Law. In the outer cabinet, Balfour becomes head of the Foreign Office, Carson of the Navy, Finlay Lord Chancellor, to mention only the most important portfolios.

The "Algerie," a French transport returning from Salonica, was torpedoed in the Mediterranean with a considerable but unknown loss of life, while the French Admiralty have given up as lost the battleship Suffren, which left Gibraltar November 24, and has not been since heard of. The Suffren was a battleship of 12,728 tons, and carried a crew of 730 men. Near Archangel, the port of Russia on the Arctic, the Germans reported the torpedoing of sixteen ammunition and supply ships in the past two or three weeks. Since the war began, so great have been the losses in gross tonnage of ships from all causes, and so small has been the new construction, that it is computed that it will take at least five years of active construction, under peace conditions, to raise the amount of available mercantile tonnage of the world to the height it was on August 1, 1914.

The French expenditures from the beginning of the war to April 1 next were officially stated by the appropriation committee of the French Chamber as having been $16,100,000,000. Of this vast sum but $2,040,000,000 has been met by taxation.

A motion in the Italian Chamber of Deputies to instruct the Italian government to negotiate for peace was voted down, 343 to 47, on December 9. The surprising part of this is not that the motion was voted down, but that such a motion was ever allowed to come before the chamber. There is, however, much discontent in Italy, it is said, over the general war situation, particularly with the enormous rise in the prices of necessities of life resulting from the war.

The Turks are making steady but not spectacular progress in driving back the Russian lines in Armenia and Persia, and if their advance continues for another month at its present rate of progress the Russian possession of Erzingan, Erzerum and Trebizond will be seriously threatened.

The Macedonian front has not been the scene of any particularly important events during the week of December 8–15, though there has been some bitter local fighting. The most noteworthy of this took place in the early part of the week, when the French and Serbians made a strong attack in the bend of the Cerna River to the east of Monastir, but after several hours' hard fighting gave up their effort.

In Greece the situation still continues obscure, owing to lack of reliable news. It appears, however, that on Friday and Saturday last, December 8 and 9, the adherents of Venizelos made an attempt at revolution in Athens. Under date of December 15 we are advised (unconfirmed) that the ultimatum presented by the Allies had been accepted by the Greek government. The ultimatum called for such surrender of military supplies and abridgment of the movement of troops, etc., as to virtually disarm Greece as an independent nation.

Unquestionably this Greek situation is a double-edged sword as far as the Allies are concerned. Undoubtedly they can capture Athens, but while they are doing this it would be quite possible for the Greeks to attack the rear of their line between Florina and Presba Lake and with the aid of a strong Teutonic army attack the same point from the north and puncture a hole in the Allies' line. Other events in the past few days give rise to the suspicion that the Teutons are moving a portion of their forces used in the Bucharest campaign to the south for some such purpose.

The Macedonian front is becoming of extreme importance, since owing to the collapse of Rumania it is only from this front that the Allies have now any possibility of delivering any blow which will cut the line of communication between the Central Powers and their allies, Turkey and Bulgaria.

The Archduke Charles Stephen of Austria has been selected to be the regent of the recently created kingdom of Poland. A king is to be elected later, but a state council will probably be convoked before Christmas.

Speaking of the results to Germany from the creation of this Polish kingdom, which the American press does not seem to understand, in discussing Germany's man-power, the London Saturday Review of November 18 expresses itself as follows:

"Germany is reorganizing the whole of her man-power against next year's campaign, and we have no doubt she is thus adding substantially—perhaps greatly—to her strength and endurance. It is exceedingly foolish to overlook or deride any changes in her arrangements which Germany is making today: the only wise plan is to assume they will tell in her favor. The cunning step she has taken in declaring Poland a kingdom will bring her a number of recruits for her armies. It is fatuous to stick our heads in the sand and pretend she will get no recruits thus, for she will."

The Rumanian campaign, however, continued active. Details of the capture of Bucharest have reached us, which show that the Rumanians made only a perfunctory defense of the town and that no bombardment was necessary to induce its surrender. After the capture of the capital, the Rumanian armies fled to the northeast in the direction of Buzeu and to the east in the direction of Ciulpita, where they hoped to turn to the northeast in the direction of Braila.

The army moving northeast was vigorously pursued by the Teutons, who captured Mezilu on the main line from Ploesci to Buzeu, and also Urzieni, twenty-five miles to the east of Ploesci, on a branch line running from this place to Slobozia. After this the Rumanians, who had been reinforced by Russians, attempted a stand between Mezilu and Buzeu, and a two days' battle ensued, which the Teutons won. The Rumanians then resumed their retreat, and it is reported have evacuated Buzeu, moving northward in the direction of Focsani, a fortified town.

The Rumanians moving eastward toward Ciulpita are still uncaptured but are practically closely surrounded on all sides but one, and have been cut off from any railroad communications by which they can withdraw. First, the Teutons pursued them from the east from Bucharest; secondly, in the middle of the week the Bulgarians managed to cross the Danube to the west of Cernavoda and barred their way to the west; and thirdly, another Bulgarian force crossed the Danube at Turtukai and advancing directly north began attacking them from the south. This leaves only one way of escape to the north, but if the Teutons operating in the center capture Buzeu, before these Rumanians pass that place on their march, their way north will be largely barred as well.

In the mountain passes on the northeastern frontier of Transylvania and Rumania, fighting between the Teutons and Russians still continued fitfully, but the Russians are now beginning successively to evacuate the southern passes, for fear of being cut off by the Teutonic advance in Central Rumania, at the exits of these passes on the plains. All told, about 130,000 Rumanians have been captured to date, about a quarter of their original army.

Except for artillery duels of no importance, the Austro-Italian front was quiet. The Russian front in Europe shared this dulness.

On the western front the French, on December 15, made a forward drive of some two miles in the region of Verdun, north of Douaumont, on a front of six miles, extending from the Meuse River to the Plain of the Woevre. Reports give the French 7,500 prisoners, including 200 officers, and the capture of several minor points. Several days of continuous artillery bombardment preceded the assault.

Is the Saloon to Go?

IT is very instructive to note the tactics that are being followed by the liquor advocates, in their efforts to counteract the rising tide of prohibition. Strangely enough, they seem to be divided on the question of the practicability of saving the saloon. Some of the leading brewers are urging a rigid enforcement of the excise law against the saloons, as a sop to public opinion. Their program would prohibit the sale of any other drinks than beer and light wines in barrooms and other places where alcoholic liquors are now sold. They would drive out of business all law-breaking saloon-keepers, abolish treating and close all bars, thus compelling the serving of light liquors at tables exclusively. This is really a significant admission of the growing temperance sentiment of the country. But such half-measures will not serve. Law-breaking saloons will continue their offenses against law and decency as often as strong drink is demanded and served, and as long as officials can be bribed to be blind to violations of the law. Cabarets will flourish, even in the face of restrictions, and their vicious influence will go on unchecked. The saloon itself is a blot upon our civilization, a wrecker of homes, a spoiler of careers, and a most prolific cause of crime, poverty, disease and other evils.

In a majority of our large cities, the liquor men already foresee the passing of the saloon. In nearly every big municipality, from New York to San Francisco, the vibration of the temperance wave has been strongly felt, and the tendency has been increasingly toward dryness and decency. It is becoming evident that the American saloon has had its day and must soon take its place among the unsavory memories of the past. Our big cities may cling to it to the last; but with the wholesome and encouraging experience before them of those municipalities which have already banished the saloon, all sane and right-minded men will ultimately unite in the verdict that its abolition would be a public benefit and a tremendous aid to thrift, morality, law and order. Already the slogan of a "saloonless nation in 1917" is being raised. Rivalries and divisions, which in past years have been a source of weakness to the temperance cause, will disappear, and in the next great battle the battalions will be united for a drive against all the forces of intemperance.

Omnipotent Reinforcement

NORFOLK, Va., Dec. 12.—Prayer was offered today before the Southern Commercial Congress for the success of peace negotiations. The congress was in the midst of a discussion on international reconstruction when Managing Director Owens read the dispatch from Berlin, saying the Teutonic allies had proposed peace. Cheers greeted the announcement. When the demonstration had subsided a delegate requested the chairman to ask some one to "invoke the blessing of the Prince of Peace upon the negotiations to end bloodshed."

This message from the South correctly indicates the sentiment of the people of all sections of our republic in welcoming the news of the first step having been taken in Europe looking to peace.

The same earnest desire, only a thousand times intensified, burns in the hearts of millions in the countries now at war.

There is no force on earth so powerful as prayer. When the prayer of faith ascends, making supplication in the Name that is above every other name, it opens the doors of heaven and finds audience at the Throne. The answer comes, reinforced by Omnipotence to accomplish its purpose.

In prayer we do not seek to conquer God's reluctance, but to take hold firmly of his willingness. We expect and look for the answer.

So, with the multitude of prayers that have been rising all these weeks, and with those that are still being offered, we have the strongest confidence and expectation that God in his wisdom will hear and answer. It is a time for renewed confidence and for reinvigorated prayer.

Legal Heresy

THE trial in Waterbury, Conn., of the Rev. Michael Mockus, a Lithuanian clergyman of the Unitarian Church, on a charge of questioning the stories of Jonah and the whale and Adam and the forbidden fruit, will attract attention. The clergyman is accused of having violated a law adopted in that state in 1642, providing a penalty for anyone "who calls into question any portion of the Holy Writ."

We were supposed to have passed this sort of thing long ago. Religious belief, tolerating no legal restraint, requires no legal enforcement. The church is not built upon human jurisprudence. True faith never resulted from legislation.

But what, we wonder, has become of that old, half-forgotten word "heretic"? Once heretics were counted by the score. One of the highest pedestals of fame was heresy. But of late there has been a total failure of the heretic crop. It is so long since anybody heard of a heretic that none but the most highly educated would trust himself to tell what it means, while very few of the younger generation ever saw one. It is hardly any use to call a man a heretic nowadays, for the chances are that he will not know enough about it to make him feel bad.

The Unsatisfied Rich

A WEALTHY New Yorker, who says he has at his command all that money can buy and unlimited leisure to enjoy it, writes to a newspaper that he is unsatisfied and asks how he may find contentment. He voices a question that must be in the minds of thousands who have thrown themselves into the whirl of money-making, to the exclusion of other things, and, when the money is made, find their lives barren of those sweet human sympathies that make life worth living.

The first thing the "successful" but unsatisfied man lacks is gratitude. He may find some satisfaction in thinking of the financially embarrassed, the impoverished, those who are struggling futilely and hopelessly, the lame, the blind, the diseased and many others so incapacitated as inevitably to suffer a worse mental condition than his. By thinking of these long enough, earnestly enough and sympathetically enough to be moved to lend to them of his strength and means, he may find more satisfaction in parting with his money than he ever found in making it.

There is no more pitiful sight in the world than that of a man with wealth, leisure and health complaining that he is unsatisfied, while all around him sick, crippled, impoverished misery is smiling through its tears.

If leisure palls upon a man, why should he maintain it? There is plenty to do—if not for himself, then for others who must ceaselessly toil.

If wealth fails to give satisfaction, why not try the joy of sharing it with those who are suffering for the barest necessaries of life?

The man with a hundred coats who is sorrowing because he can wear only one at a time might remember the coatless and find joy in the light of thanks that would glow from grateful eyes.

Many are the ways in which the man of wealth and leisure may find satisfaction. But he will never find it in himself. He must make of his wealth not a barrier, but a bond, between himself and his fellows. He must get busy, not for himself, but for others.

How the War Robs the World

THE statisticians are still busy figuring out the approximate cost of the great war, assuming that it lasts a full three years. Count Roedern, Secretary of the Imperial German Treasury, and a recognized authority, has estimated the cost of the war to all the nations for the past twenty-seven months at $59,500,000,000. An American estimate, also conservative, is that of the Mechanic and Metals National Bank of New York, which gives $75,000,000,000 as the total cost, if the struggle should last until August, 1917—three full years. This last-named authority gives the cost of the first year's fighting at $17,500,000,000; that of the second year, $28,000,000,000; and the third year, $30,000,000,000. The grand total is equal to double the sum of all the national debts in the world, as those debts stood in August, 1914. It is seven times as big as the united deposits of the 7,600 national banks in the United States, and seven times as large as the entire world's supply of minted gold. It would pay for building 200 Panama Canals. And the Metals National Bank's booklet adds:

> It would have extended railway and steamship lines into every corner of the earth; it would have provided schools and teachers for every child living to-day; it would have eliminated savagery; it would have endowed science to the devotion of its efforts to improve the living conditions of all mankind.
>
> And yet the military cost is not all. There is to be considered the outright destruction, speaking in terms of tangible wealth, of cities, railways, ships, factories, warehouses, bridges, roads, and agricultural values—destruction that for given months would require figures of further thousands of millions, were such destruction readily calculable. There is the loss of that percentage of Europe's manhood maimed and destroyed. There is the loss of production in occupied territories, the decrease in stocks of food, metal, and other materials, the derangement of the machinery of distribution.
>
> There is the outright loss of property which twenty-five million soldiers and many other millions of people would hav created had they not been enlisted to fight or otherwise to contribute their skill and energy to the pursuit of war. Ther is the loss represented by the devoting of people's savings to the buying of guns, shells, and the vast paraphernalia of war' equipment; savings that otherwise would have found a way to the construction of permanent things. There is the very rea economic loss on account of the aggregation of suffering and misery of whole bodies of people, like those of Belgium, Poland, and Serbia, made at times to wander homeless through devastated lands. There is the eventual cost of pensions.

The Foodship on Her Way

AN enthusiastic send-off was planned for the U. S. S. Cæsar, which was to sail from New York December 16, carrying a cargo of a quarter of a million dollars' worth of food to the starving Syrians and Armenians. May kindly weather hasten her passage to Beirut, and may nothing occur to delay a quick and prosperous voyage. She goes auspiciously at the time when the world is beginning to talk of peace.

In other years, the readers of the Christian Herald have sent out food-ships to India, China, Russia, Cuba and other lands. Now they join hands with other contributors from many quarters who have united to make up the cargo of the Cæsar. May the food be the means of saving many precious lives, and impressing upon the people of those distant lands the fact that the western republic never turns a deaf ear to the call of human suffering.

Preparatory Prayer in Evangelism

ALL the epochal revivals of history have been preceded by prayer-burdened hearts. This is the way to open the windows of heaven and the hardened hearts of men. Wilbur Chapman and Billy Sunday always require two months of prayer preparedness before beginning the revival campaign. The different denominations uniting in the meeting are requested to hold union prayer services, both in the churches and in the homes of the people. At Paterson Billy Sunday's coming was postponed for three weeks, but the revival began on the expected Sunday, in answer to the prayers of the united congregations, with nearly two hundred conversions on that day. Truly, we must plow by prayer if we would reap the mighty harvest.

Moses and Elijah delivered Israel by prayer. The Transfiguration and Pentecost were preceded by prayer. Prayer opens the sluiceway to the irrigating channel of the River of Life. Prayer connects the human with the divine, throwing on the belt of power that moves the machinery of all church organization in the salvation of the people. David Livingstone prayed for a revival all of one night before he was to preach on a certain Sunday morning. When the hour for service arrived, the church was filled with people and the churchyard was full of those waiting to gain entrance. It is said that five hundred conversions was the result of that single service.

If minister and members would get under the burden of the guilt of lost souls and cry with Moses, "Blot me out of thy book, but save this people," or with Paul, "I could wish myself accursed for Israel's sake," then a mighty movement of revival power, like the ocean's tide, would flood all shores and bless all the peoples of the earth.

WE are again confronted with the old question of the attitude of Jesus Christ toward war. Did he or did he not teach the legitimacy of military force as a means of settling disputes? Was Jesus Christ a pacifist?

The arguments for war based on the teachings of Jesus are best described by Shakespeare:

> "What damned error but some sober brow
> To bless it, and approve it with a text?"

Jesus everywhere was opposed to physical force. He had nothing but rebuke for the one who smote the servant of the high priest. His behavior under temptation in the wilderness, his own analysis of himself on the way to Cæsarea-Philippi, his supreme self-mastery in the Garden of Gethsemane and at Golgotha, showed him superior to physical force; showed him, indeed, surcharged with a super-force, the force of love, of service, of sacrifice, of gentleness, of persuasion and consolation—the very force that won eight million followers within two centuries and overcame the Roman world. There was nothing in him of the camp or of the modern emphasis that states rest only on guns and battleships. His heart and faith and message were of peace. The heart and faith and message of the Christian Church for its first two hundred years—said by some to be the only Christian Church which we have ever had—was the heart and faith and message of peace. The supreme fact of the Christian ethic was then, and ought to be now, THAT JESUS CHRIST WAS A PACIFIST.

First Aid

SUNDAY, December 31. I Kings 19 : 5. "Behold, an angel touched him, and said unto him, Arise and eat." Here is a prophet in the bonds of melancholy. The light of his hope has been lown out. His soul has been convulsed, and his aith is shaken and lies like an overturned pillar upon he ground. Life has lost its strong serviceableness nd its attractive savor. Nothing remains that is orth while. The brief volume of his active, busy lays is ending in futility and disaster. "And he came nd sat down under a juniper tree, and requested for imself that he might die."

"And, behold an angel!" And what will the angel lo for this fainting, drooping servant of God? What will the angel say? What first aid will he give to this broken spirit? Does he rend the temporal veil and rejuvenate the wayworn prophet by some vivid glimpse of the fighting hosts of God? Does he make some startling declaration of the reality of the Creator's immediate presence and power? The angel's ministry is of a much more simple character. "He touched him and said, Arise and eat." Is that all? Yes, that is all. That is the beginning and the end of the angel's mission.

Now, that is very significant. An angel comes to a godly man who is depressed in spirit, and he tells him to give immediate attention to the needs of his body! The beginnings of restoration are to be found in an ordinary meal. Some of his spiritual faintness is due to his physical faintness, and if he removes the one he will help to dispel the other. He has allowed himself to get "run down," and his bodily exhaustion has partially induced the exhaustion of his soul.

That is a peril against which we need to be on our guard. Our spiritual maladies are strengthened by our bodily neglects. There are some forms of fearfulness which are directly attributable to our bodies being "out of sorts." Weakness engenders doubt. Anemia produces sluggish wills. Bad blood creates irritableness and all the miserable retinue that follows in its train. Ill-fed nerves foster nervousness and the ten thousand fears which portray a discordant and chaotic world. Many a man has the nightmare that his public usefulness has ended, and the cause of the nightmare is a body which is clamoring for a little more care. Even Mr. Spurgeon wrote out his resignation more than once, under the depressing conviction that his ministry was over; but it was only a rebellious body which was coloring everything blue. One night's sleep, and in the morning his purposed resignation was committed to the flames! Yes, a little more care for the body and many burdensome needs would never arise.

And in these times of sorrow, through which we are living, let us not make our griefs tyrannical by giving them the allies of exhausted bodies. In these exacting days let us not forget that our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost. Let us reverence their calls, and we shall meet the higher demands of the Spirit with prepared and sanctified strength. We shall be ready to go and "stand on the mount before the Lord" when we have obeyed the angel's counsel to "Arise and eat!" J. H. J.

Mountain Trial and Triumph

MONDAY, January 1, 1917. Matt. 17 : 1, 2. "And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." It can not have escaped our notice that many of the memorable events in Jesus' life occurred on mountain slopes or mountain summits. He began his public teaching on a mountain. He was tempted on a mountain. He was transfigured on a mountain. He was crucified on a mountain. From a mountain slope he ascended to his Father and ours. But apart from these facts, which are symbolic, it is evident Jesus lived all his life on the heights. He had visions one can have only from lofty moral altitudes. He fought his battles on a high plane.

One at least of the three representative temptations of Jesus owed the power of its appeal to the vast vision which was possible only from a mountain top. On Hermon or Tabor—whichever may have been the Mount of Transfiguration—far above the madding crowd, amidst the silence and the sanctities of a shrine prepared by the Father's own hand, the face and garments of Jesus shone forth with unwonted radiance. As his temptation on a mountain was a type of ours, so was his transfiguration. We too may be transfigured. There are many things which transfigure life—change its appearance, glorify it visibly. Pride, hope, joy, love, all have transfiguring power. Love has, supremely, among purely human experiences. Prayer has, supremely, within the compass of possible divine experience. "We kneel how weak, we rise how full of power." C. C. A.

The Cheerfulness of the Gospel

TUESDAY, January 2. Isa. 60 : 1. "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the Glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." If the Jews to whom this appeal was made had realized their grand mission to men, what a glorious history should be theirs! To be the heralds of the Messiah, the torch-bearers of the Gospel of redemption, the purveyors of the highest knowledge, the wisdom unto salvation to the whole human race—that is a dignity so great that men who are entrusted with it should appear among their fellows with a heavenly light upon their countenances, transfigured with a glory which no earthly learning, wealth, or high station can give. The Jews missed their calling: the Christ came unto his own, and his own received him not. But the appeal of Isaiah is still issued: it is addressed to every true Israelite, every believer in the Seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth are to be blessed. The appeal urges upon them to be up and doing, and to go about the work of the Lord with radiant faces. The Church of Christ is launched upon a joyous enterprise: it brings lasting cheer to despairing hearts. Such an enterprise requires cheerful agents. Not with sour mien and sullen look, not slovenly and grudgingly like slaves who must be prodded to their tasks, but with enthusiastic self-surrender and exulting joy should God's children engage in their every activity. We cannot do the Lord's work sitting down and indulging sentimental wishes for men's betterment. We must leap to our tasks as to exquisite privileges, and make ourselves by our ardent zeal the finest recommendation of the church to men. W. H. T. D.

The Divine Saviour of Men

WEDNESDAY, January 3. Matt. 16 : 16. "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Those who doubt our Lord's deity are pleased to call him "the ideal human," "the superman," "the wonderful exemplar," or "the brightest flower of humanity;" but such poor compliments are often to cover away the higher glory of his divinity. They are mock robes and crowns, such as the crucifiers put on him when they cried in derision, "Hail, King of the Jews!"

The Christian world receives Christ as the Son of man and the Son of God—the God-Man. Behold him asleep in a boat, like a man; but see him arise, bidding the winds be still, like a God. If he ate like a man, he pronounced the Emmaus blessing as God. If he asked for a drink like a man, he gave to the woman at the well the living water as God. If he wept like a man at the grave of a friend, he spoke as God when he cried, "Lazarus, come forth." If he died like a malefactor, he arose as God himself and became the resurrection and the life to all humanity. If he walked up the slopes of Olivet like a man, he ascended as God. If he appeared like a human on the cross, he said words as God when he exclaimed, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

If he left his disciples like other humans in the hour of death, he spoke as never man spake when he said, "I go to prepare a place for you. Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." In the beginning, he was the Creator; in the ending, he is the Redeemer; in the forever, he is King eternal, Prince of Peace, the Everlasting Father and the Lord of Glory. E. W. C.

The "Beauty of the Lord"

THURSDAY, January 4. Ps. 90 : 17. "And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." The Bible has little to say about beauty, that is, about exterior beauty. The words "beauty" and "beautiful" occur but rarely in the Scriptures. Christianity emphasizes interior beauty, nobility of sentiment, splendor of goodness, grace of character, harmony of faculties, perfection of life. While Christianity is not hostile to art as the expression of the beautiful in sound or form or color, and while Christians are not indifferent to the fine arts—all of which are potentially handmaidens of religion—nevertheless the Christian's aspiration is best expressed in such a prayer as that of the psalmist of long ago, "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us."

Joseph Cook used to speak of the "solar look" on the human face. Moses "wist not that the skin of his face shone." Nothing lights up the face and brightens the eye like the daily habit of communion with the divine. Nothing transfigures life, nothing chisels and polishes the human statue like the habitual attitude of submission to the will of God. The spiritual life writes its record in the saintly face. Nothing on earth is more beautiful than the face of one who has overcome—whose lifelong habit it has been to overcome. He has reached the summit of the years, has kept his faith strong and his temper sweet. Wrinkles? "They are not wrinkles, but smiles drifted from their moorings." The beauty of the Lord our God is visibly upon his servants. C. C. A.

In the World, Yet Not of It

FRIDAY, January 5. Rom. 12 : 2. "Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." Christ declared to Nicodemus that entrance into the kingdom of God is by a new birth. "If any man be in Christ," says Paul, "he is a new creature. Christianity is, first, a life. Into the heart of man, dead in trespasses and sins, there enters the power of God, the word of life, the Gospel of Christ. Godlike thoughts and impulses begin to stir where there was nothing but apathy and deadness toward all things divine. The person has, as it were, been made over again in his inmost being. He knows too that he is no longer what he used to be. Out of this life comes, secondly, a living. The inward change which grace has wrought in a believer's heart is manifested outwardly. The renewing of the mind is followed by a transformation of which the world is made aware. The Christian lives among worldly men, and has many things in common with them that pertain to his natural life. But he does not follow the fashions and customs of the worldly society around him. His new knowledge of what God wants of him, and his new determination to test the goodness of what God proposes for him to do or to suffer, cause the Christian to differ from worldly men. He finds that he cannot think, speak, act, on given subjects as his non-Christian fellow men do. Very often unpleasant situations arise for the Christian, because of his refusal to cooperate with worldly men in matters where he plainly hears the voice of his heavenly Father calling him to duty. But his refusal on such occasions brings him a great blessing; he is made to understand with increased clearness that it is good to follow God, rather than to run with the world. The ways of God become ways of pleasantness to him, and he pushes forward on this road to the perfect man in Christ. W. H. T. D.

The Full Assurance of Faith

SATURDAY, January 6. Rom. 8 : 35. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" Paul had endured about all the forces of evil that attack the soul in this world, such as tribulation, persecution, famine, peril, war, nakedness and distress. Judging the future by the past, he could exclaim, "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels . . . nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Paul, therefore, enjoyed the blessing of a full assurance of faith. As there is a point where gravitation goes the other way, toward the central sun, so the soul passes a line where earth loses its grip and is drawn toward the Sun of Righteousness with all the power of love divine. The great apostle had reached the realm of certainty, and could sing, "I am going through." "I know he is able to keep that which I have committed to him." "I know I have a building of God, not made with hands, and I am persuaded that there is nothing on earth to stop me." Christ, the Conductor and Builder of the Gospel railroad, had whispered to him that the next station was Heaven. At every curve he had glimpses of the celestial city and realized that he was absolutely certain of the greatest fact in human existence—saved eternally! The love of Christ was the habit of his soul, a second nature that had reached permanency. Here there was no going back, no looking back; he had fought the fight, kept the faith, and he could wait patiently for death to break down the door and let his spirit go free. E. W. C.

Six Thousand Jean Valjeans

CONTINUING MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS' LETTERS FROM THE ORIENT

Shirosuke Arima, the only Christian warden in Japan

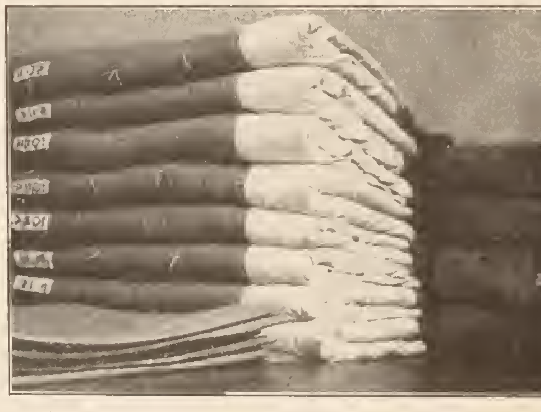
YOU remember the place in "Les Misérables" where Jean Valjean, dragged before the Bishop, whose plate he had stolen, is offered in addition the Bishop's candlesticks. You also remember how, when the police had left the powerful convict and the gentle Bishop together, the older and weaker man triumphed over the sinner.

"Jean Valjean, my brother, you no longer belong to evil but to good. I have bought your soul for you. I withdraw it from black thoughts and the spirit of perdition and give it to God."

Fiction and imaginative idealism, you say. Or possibly you do not sufficiently believe that what is yours is your brother's to justify the Bishop in his statement that the plate and candlesticks belonged to the miserable man who was brought before him. Besides, how can one reconcile soul-freedom with the buying of one man's soul by another?

I had my doubts about it until I met the Bishop in Japan. Instead of one Jean Valjean, he has dealt with six thousand convicts, and over four thousand of them have turned out well.

Really he isn't a Bishop at all. He's just a common layman, not a brilliant man nor one of surpassing power. But he's a Christian, and a real one,—a follower of the Christ-life and not of some antiquated doctrine. He is a man of mighty faith, both in God and in his fellow men, and therein lies his power.



Bedding for eight, with the hard Japanese pillows, piled on one side of a cell for eight men

His home is open to hundreds of criminals, who have done the right-about-face toward the light under his direction. So far this year he has placed five hundred and sixty criminals in positions of usefulness and even of trust. His ten children, all of whom are succeeding beyond the average, were brought up with convicts as companions, and under the same roof with men and women of all classes of crime, from murderers, highway robbers and incendiaries to gamblers, prostitutes and vagrants. They are all one family together and they live in peace.

His face is one of tenderness. Tears stood in his eyes as we talked—tears of sympathy and tears of joy. From the wall of his room there looked down upon me a picture of a man whose influence on my life has been second to none. I knew Charles Richmond Henderson less than three months. But in that time I came to know a real Christian—one of the two or three finest men I have ever met. Up there on the wall was a group picture, and in the center of that group was Dr. Henderson. Beside him sat the gentle-faced Bishop. Behind them stood an old man who had been condemned to life imprisonment, but who became a strong Christian and was released by the Emperor.

Whenever a prisoner seeks the time he reads the message of Eternal Love

THERE are some things in life that one cannot explain by human laws. The friend of six thousand convicts would fail in Wall Street, and though he is a literary man in a small way he is not a genius in any sense. Corra Harris might have modeled her Felix Wade on this man's character; but I doubt whether he would ever be a great preacher. But oh, what a wonderful practicer he is! The Emperor and Empress of Japan practically support him, and Marquis Okuma is his friend; but he prefers the company of criminals and lives with them. Once a friend of the Christian Herald gave him twelve dollars to help carry on his work, and he has remembered that gift for years. That gift of twelve dollars formed two per cent. of his year's expenses. Fifty such friends could double his income, but it would do no good. The supply of criminals might not hold out.

Many of his friends have never entered a prison, for this man has made such a place for himself in the system of justice that certain classes of first offenders are handed over to him, instead of being sent to jail. He is not connected with the government, nor will he cooperate with other prison reformers in Japan, for their association accepted $357,500 from a shipping firm which had received a bribe in the naval scandal of a few years ago, and he will not do God's work with "tainted money." He is a very "unreasonable" man. His path is faith and not reason. This is his short cut to a knowledge of God.

Two of the pictures in his room might be the illustrations for his life. One is the upward look of Christ in Gethsemane. The other is the downward look of the Good Shepherd, clinging to a steep hillside and reaching down to aid the hundredth sheep that was lost. This reformer is a man of constant prayer, and his business for thirty years has been helping the lost sheep.

Hundreds of these men and women, who have been branded as criminals, have joined churches and led earnest Christian lives for years. Many are raising Christian families. One had served a sentence in a Hokkaido prison for eighteen years. The friend of criminals took him into his home and, later, sent him to Formosa, where a rise in the value of the hard-earned land he owned has made him a rich man and a generous supporter of the Methodist Church. I wonder when those ex-convicts will send missionaries to America, or take up prison reform with Tom Brown of Sing Sing.

If you like melodrama, how is this? A robber enters a mission school for girls and makes the girls hand over all they have. While his razor-edged knife hovers over her, out steps one Christian girl and hands him a Bible and expresses the hope that he will find it of value. In prison, Mr. Taneaki Hara (that is the Bishop's name) came to him, again asking this man—who had almost touched bottom—to study the Scriptures. His family now has a good home and a Christian leader as its head. These are facts. I don't try to explain them. I only state them.

The home in which this man lives with his friends was built by ex-convicts and the funds were provided by a garden party in the beautiful grounds of Marquis Okuma. Not only ex-convicts find a clean, wholesome home here, but mistreated children and homeless people of all sorts enter here, with no questions asked.

Mr. Hara was one of the first Christian converts forty-one years ago. He studied in the school which has since become Meiji Gakuin. As a publisher, he sold Bibles and commentaries, but in 1883 he published a treatise on freedom which was too advanced for his day, and for a long time he was imprisoned by the Imperial Government and there gained his deep sympathy for the prisoners.

How the Circuit Rider's Widow would thrill at knowing that a Japanese Christian is daily acting upon these words, which express his outlook on life:

"If we really sympathize with prisoners, we should give them work, so that they can have a roof to shelter them, food to live on, and clothing to cover their bodies."

Mr. Hara is studying the records of two thousand juvenile offenders and will soon issue a book on the subject of "Environment and its Relation to Crime." He has already written one helpful book on "The Modern Child," in which he tries to show mothers how to bring up their children in ways of rectitude. He is firmly convinced that crime is not hereditary, and that when the environment is right the man will be righteous and of sound morals.

I spent nearly two hours with Mr. Hara and I did not hear the words "efficiency," "strategic center," or "evangelization of the world in this generation" once. He is not a "missionary statesman" in any sense of the word. He lives Christianity, that is all.

MANY years ago, long before Thomas Cook began to sell entrance tickets to Japanese temples in their Broadway office, there came to Japan a medical missionary. I never heard of him and very likely neither did you. His name was John C. Berry. That is not important. But he brought to those he met the Christ idea. One person whom he affected was a seventeen-year-old boy, who at that time was using Confucianism as a ladder to Christianity. He didn't know Confucianism was a ladder. He thought it was a capstone; but when he found Christianity he stepped boldly from the ladder onto the higher plateau and began to explore it. He wasn't one of

CHRISTIAN HERALD EDITORIAL FEATURES

"The Road to Understanding"

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER, Author of "Pollyanna," "Just David," etc.

IT gives us great pleasure to announce that we have secured for serial publication in the Christian Herald a new story by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, whose famous story, "Pollyanna," was first published in the Christian Herald. Competent critics who have read the manuscript declare the new story to be as good if not better than "Pollyanna." The publishers of the story in book form have such confidence in its coming success that they are arranging to print a first edition of one hundred thousand copies, which will be sold at $1.35 a copy. This story in itself is well worth the price of a year's subscription. The first instalment of this remarkable story will be printed in the Christian Herald early during the coming year.

Through the Orient

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

OUR readers already know of the journeyings of this bright American writer in the Far East. His entertaining descriptions of Japan China and Korea will be a continuing feature of prime interest in these pages during 1917. Mr. Williams is doing much to give us the right perspective on Oriental life and character, besides showing what are the true relations and sentiments of the people of the East toward ourselves. Next to making a trip to China and Japan, you cannot do better than read every one of these splendid, well-illustrated articles.

Mountain Peaks of Prophecy

ONE of the leading authorities on Prophecy today is Professor James M. Gray, dean of Moody Institute of Chicago, already well known to our readers, who has promised to contribute four comprehensive and wonderfully enlightening articles on "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," which every one who loves to look forward to the time of the world's redemption will read with intense interest.

Our Sermonic Department

OUR Sermonic Department will give the Gospel message a stronger and more confident note than ever before. Among the regular contributors will be Rev. J. H. Jowett, who besides contributing the first sermon of each month will also lead in the Meditations. Other contributors will be Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, Rev. David J. Burrell, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Pastor D. H. Steffens, Pastor H. P. Eckhardt, Rev. C. A. Eaton and Dr. F. B. Meyer.

Religious Progress During 1917

MORE than in any previous year in its history, the Christian Herald proposes to keep in statistical touch with all of the Christian denominations for the purpose of showing, from time to time, their spiritual progress and the growth of true religion throughout the country. All of the information published will be gathered from the official leaders of the various denominations, and will be found reliable and authentic.

The World's "Biggest Business"

IT is now generally admitted that there is no business on earth which can compare in magnitude, in the material means employed, or in astonishing, world-wide development, with the business of Christian Missions. It has been stated that it is bigger than the next half-dozen businesses rolled into one, both as to the numbers engaged and the capital invested. The growth of the "King's Business" will receive attention in these columns during 1917.

New Sacred Songs

DURING the coming year the Christian Herald will publish a number of new hymns with music. These compositions are the productions of some of the leading composers of the day. These beautiful songs, some of them solos with chorus, others four-part songs, etc., are suited for choir work or for the home-gathering or for other occasions.

Making Your Church Known

THE plain fact is being recognized that churches cannot rely upon their silent influence to draw people within their doors. The real difficulty is in drawing a line between unsuitable methods of church advertising and methods that are both eminently in keeping with the high character of the church's mission and effective in interesting the public. How to fill your church with people and how to fill the people with your church will be treated by men who have succeeded.

The Church With a Problem

THE church with a problem today is the out-of-town church. In thousands of villages the local churches find themselves losing in influence and in support. New attractions for the young people have sprung up that strongly compete with the church. That such conditions need not exist in any town where there is a live church is proven over and over again in hundreds of places. It shall be our endeavor to show how this very real problem is being solved.

Health for Every Workingman

By IDA M. TARBELL

WE have in hand the second of Miss Tarbell's very interesting narratives about the things that are being done in many industrial plants to separate the workingman from the evil influences of the saloon and safeguard him against hazards of his occupation. This article, which will run through two or three numbers, describes some of the conditions under which workmen toil, and the methods employed by big employers of labor to cooperate with their employees in bringing about better workroom and home surroundings. This is an important contribution to the subject, and is well illustrated.

"How Janice Day Won the Temperance Fight"

By HELEN BEECHER LONG, Author of "Janice Day," and "The Testing of Janice Day"

THIS is the story of the strenuous efforts of Janice to stamp out the drink evil from her beloved small town. The story will be printed in book form at $1.25, but subscribers for the Christian Herald will be able to read it without one cent of extra expense. It is easily alone worth the subscription price.

The Reformation Jubilee

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTEEN is the four hundredth anniversary of the Reformation. Protestant America is arranging for a great Jubilee Celebration. All the denominations are interested in it. Special articles, dealing with the leading phases of the Reformation and the influence of Luther's life and work on America and the world, will be contributed by able writers.

Is Christianity a Failure?

DURING the past year the great question, "Is Christianity a Failure?" has been sharply discussed throughout the religious world. Assaults have been made on the Church from without and within, and a terrible indictment of inefficiency has been leveled against it. Is this right and justifiable, or is it wrong? Has the Church lost its power to win men to Christ? To what extent is it responsible for the European collapse? What must it do to save its own soul? These and other kindred questions will be discussed in a series of powerful articles by the Rev. Mercer G. Johnston.

The Church and Present-Day Problems

HOW far should the Church go in taking an attitude of activity toward the solution of social, economic, moral, and industrial problems? How far is it justified in using its influence and the means at its disposal in bringing about better conditions for the neglected millions, in addition to giving them the Gospel? Can it successfully carry the doctrines taught by Jesus into all the affairs of everyday life, without interference with the functions of the State? There are many important ramifications to this subject, which will be discussed during the coming year.

Are We Nearing the End of the Age?

STUDENTS of the Bible and those who are watchful of the signs of the times are everywhere discussing the question whether the world is not approaching what has been termed "The End of the Age." There are multiplying indications of a great and world-wide change, which many believe to be due after the present tremendous struggle is over—a change which may suddenly reveal itself as the fulfilment of some long-discussed prophecy. What will be the condition of society in the event of a new age being ushered in? The ablest minds will discuss this alluring topic during the coming year in the pages of the Christian Herald.

Well-Known Contributors

FAMOUS men and women, who stand high in the literary and sociological world, will be among our contributors for 1917: Florence Morse Kingsley, author of "Titus" and "Stephen;" Josephine A. Dodge and Carrie C. Catt, representing the opposing wings of Woman Suffrage; Lucy Rider Meyer, the charming writer on philanthropy and sociology; Amelia E. Barr, whose stories are read everywhere; Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of Christian Endeavor, and globe-trotter; Charles Stelzle, field secretary, sociologist and long active in Christian and humanitarian work; Frank Carpenter, traveler, author and lecturer; Hedgar Pluviannes, whose little tragedies of the Great War have enthralled our readers; Professor David Smith, the famous authority on Bible interpretation, and many others.

The Church and Socialism

IT is a most significant fact that, at the recent Protestant Episcopal General Convention, some thirteen of the new bishops were found on the side of Socialism. Christian Socialism is making its headway in many of the denominations. The question is asked, "Was Jesus Christ a Socialist?" in the sense that his teachings are of a character which many Socialists acknowledge as the basis of their economic creed; justice to labor, universal helpfulness, the dangers of increasing wealth, the rights of the poor, man's duty toward God and man, etc. These vital topics will receive attention.

Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of Pollyanna - Miss Billy - The Story of Marco - The Turn of the Tide - Cross Currents - etc.
The Christian Herald

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. 445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

Here are some of the difficult questions that are thoroughly dealt with in this new book:

Does God employ evil spirits?
What should be the Christian attitude on dancing?
Is the Bible opposed to woman suffrage?
Is it wrong for Christian people to read fiction?
Can a Christian conscientiously play cards?
Will the future state be one of material or spiritual glory?
Does a suicide lose his inheritance in heaven?
What should be the Christian's attitude on war?
What is fellowship with God?
Who was Pilate's wife?
Do angels visit people now?
What is "worldly dress"?
What church entertainments are permissible, and what otherwise; fairs, suppers, etc.?
What does the Bible tell us of the Second Coming?
What is the soul?
If God is omnipotent, why does he let sin go on?
Does God permit evil that good may result?

428 other equally important questions.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35. Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Martin Luther Anniversary Book

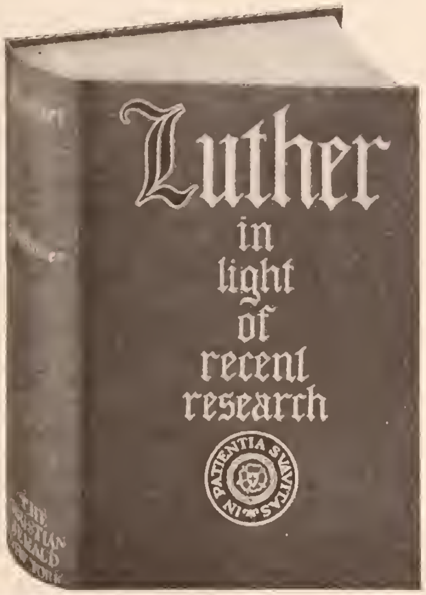
Luther in Light of Recent Research"

WHILE there are several lives of Luther. Professor Heinrich Boehmer's amous work, which has attracted universal ttention in Europe, is one of the be t that as ever appeared. It comes most opporunely in view of the celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the ld castle church at Wittenberg, which was he beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has had the work ranslated by Professor Car' F. Huth, Jr., f the University of Chicago, who has sueeeded in preserving the spirit and the xpr ssion of the original in a remarkable legree.

This great book, which should be read y every Protestant in America, is supplenented by a series of eighty-one Luther ictures, all of them from the most authenie sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

We will send the "Life of Luther," handsomely bound in cloth, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.75. Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.



Two Books by a Famous Pastor

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D.

DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein, and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands, as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarefied atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture. He drinks deep draughts at the springs of faith, warms himself in the sunlight of hope, and finds cheer and comfort, consolation and strength to go forward.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.50. Or, we will send a copy of each volume to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

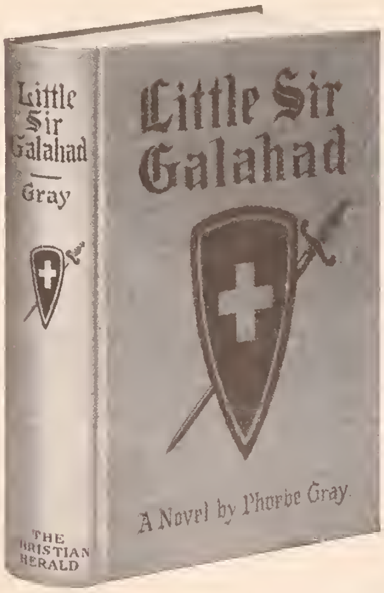
40,000 Beautiful Quotations

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. It was a remarkable compilation, and it was used largely in public as well as private libraries.

In the course of time, the edition of this book became exhausted. We had so many inquiries for the work that we have republished it, thoroughly revised.

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of today, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to accomplish that result

We will send "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50. Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $4.00.



Little Sir Galahad

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD is a boy every bit as wonderful and with as high ideals as those of the ancient Knights, but he is an up-to-date hero and a very real little personage, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and, together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence, he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story.

"Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Lem Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate. There is much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story.

We will send "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50. Or, we will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription with $2.00.

those Sunday school "heathen," dressed in teeth and a smile. In common with thousands of so-called heathen, he was a young man of bright intellect, good morals and a real desire to know God. He just hadn't had a chance, that is all. But when he came in contact with this medical missionary, whose Christianity was a thing he carried about with him, this boy of seventeen decided that Christianity was what he was looking for.

He went to the Doshisha, which still remains the best Christian school in Japan, and there sought some way to put his Christianity into practice. He worked for four years and then was appointed chaplain in a Hokkaido prison. At that time, Christianity in Japan, he says, was a matter of sound. The young chaplain had studied doctrines for many years but it was the life of a medical missionary that won him to Christ, and he planned, not to continue preaching, but to begin doing something for his fellowmen. He instinctively turned to applied Christianity as the hope of the New Japan.

We sometimes think that most of the relief work in Japan is done by missions. In Japan, there are 579 charity and relief institutions, among which 117 are directly helped by the government. Of the 117, sixteen are out-and-out Christian institutions, and eight are out-and-out Buddhist institutions, the rest being unconnected with religious bodies in a direct way. Of the sixteen Christian institutions not one is under foreign control.

All of Japan has only one-fifth as many charitable institutions as has New York City alone, and one-fourth as many as London. The reasons for this are interesting, but as we have now looked around the room and drunk our chocolate, allow me to introduce Mr. Kosuke Tomeoka, an earnest Christian, a recognized authority on charity problems, two-months voluntary prisoner in Elmira Reformatory many years before Tom Brown entered a narrow cell, two years a student of prison conditions in the United States, close friend of Dr. Charles Richmond Henderson, sixteen years chief adviser to the Home Department on questions of charity and relief, late Commissioner of Reform and Philanthropic Work, present head of the Home School, and a world visionist in applied Christianity.

"IN Japan," says our host, "there is little public charity work. This is due to two causes. The first is the family system, which has so many ramifications that those who might be helped by public institutions in a new land are supported by some well-to-do relative. The second is the infancy of the charity institutions in Japan.

"Most of the existing charities were directly or indirectly inspired by Christianity, although our queen established a leper asylum and an orphanage more than a thousand years ago.

"Mr. Hara's reform work on ex-convicts has borne such a sterling testimony of usefulness that the Buddhists have imitated him. In the Home Department, a succession of Christian pastors have been chief advisers to the Government in eleemosynary matters. Prominent among them was Mr. Kanamori, a leading Christian in the early days, who wandered from the faith through theological discussions but was led back to Christ through the applied Christianity of the Salvation Army. My successor is Mr. Namai, another Christian pastor. The government ideal in penology and charity is the Christian ideal; but this ideal is not yet reached. Mr. Arima, at present warden of Kosuge jail, was, twenty years ago, the warden of Sugamo penitentiary, while I was chaplain there. He is at present the only Christian warden in Japan.

"My idea is to make every man self-respecting and self-supporting through his own individual effort. Charity destroys the independence of the people. In Japan we are trying to discourage any extension of charity work. In every case, the order of relief is, first, the family, second, the local district and, third, the empire. If the person has relatives, his relief is entrusted to them."

I asked Mr. Tomeoka to tell me something of his private work, to which he now is giving his entire attention.

"While chaplain in Hokkaido," he replied, "I made a careful study of three hundred cases in Sorachi Prison and found that in eighty-five per cent. of the cases the inmates had been wayward boys. Their crime began in youth, when environment, rather than determination, ruled their acts.

"Seventeen years ago I took one incorrigible boy into my home and started the present 'Home School.' He was the companion of my four boys. In the course of time he was completely reformed. We have had three hundred boys in the school and seventy-five per cent. have been thoroughly reformed and are leading good lives. But this school has been only an experiment.

"Two years ago I secured from the government a tract of land in the Hokkaido, amounting to two thousand five hundred acres. Of this, two thousand acres will be rented to tenants—poor men, who can be induced to go to Hokkaido and settle there.

"When they have gotten started, they will pay enough rent to return the aid and also support the reform school for 150 boys on the other 500 acres."

We visited the cottages, where the boys live in Christian homes with a house-mother and a house-father to care for them; we went to the wood-working department, where they learn cabinetmaking and at the same time make salable articles of furniture; to the laundry, where the work from 200 houses is taken in and well done; to the library, with two "prophet chambers" adjoining; and to the little thatch-roofed house where Mr. Tomeoka began this school by taking one bad boy in to live with him, and which he still occupies as his home.

The Home School is out in the suburbs and there is plenty of land; but way up in Hokkaido is the school of the future. The foundations are not laid yet, but in the great forest—whose trees remind one of the line, "The groves were God's first temples"—there are seats for several hundred people, formed by flattening unsawn tree-trunks. In front of these seats is a great stump, which forms the pulpit of this open-air church in the "Young America Land" of Hokkaido.

Right there is the center of Mr. Tomeoka's thoughts; for long after he has passed off the stage, several hundred independent, self-respecting farmers, whose labors in the new land will support scores of wayward boys and save them from the sink-holes of the cities, will here meet to look up through the arching branches and thank God for the gift of his Son, in whom by believing one need not perish as a human failure, but have eternal life through applied Christianity.

CHAPTER XIX

In Which I Fall

THE next day and the next and the next brought me no work. Everywhere I went I was turned down cold. I didn't know how to apply for a job. Allowing for bed money and one meal a day, my funds were good only for two days more.

I kept out of my old haunts. I knew the necessity of that. Consequently I was very much surprised on meeting one of my former pals way off his usual beat, up above Cooper Square. He hailed me and put me wise to a busting job. The employees of the American Locomotive Works at Schenectady, New York, were out on strike, and the Pinkertons had the job. I grabbed the tip eagerly and went after the job. I knew it would be an inside one and there would be no booze. In a busting job like that they take the scab help, put them in the plant, and lock the doors. That's done to keep the scabs inside all the time and the strikers outside all the time. We slept on cots the firm provided. I got the job easily and the pay was four dollars a day—a fortune. There was nothing to spend for board or lodging. I saw visions of a little home. I'd get a little place somewhere in a neighborhood where I was unknown. I'd take Jane there; we'd begin all over again, and I'd be a good kind husband to her. I believe I was happy on that job!

It was then that I first took from my pocket the New Testament I carried. I read it, portions of it carefully, but I couldn't understand it, couldn't even make head or tail out of it. It failed to make the slightest impression on me, and yet I read and read again certain portions. If it hadn't been for my size and apparent strength the bunch would have had a lot of fun over it, and over me, for they were a hard lot. They didn't like the way my sails were cut, so they kept quiet. One fellow, though, with whom I became quite friendly, told me he always thought he'd seen everything there was to see until he saw my Bible on a busting job. It was a new one to him, and I admitted it was to me as well.

AT the end of my first week I went to the boss and drew fifteen dollars against my pay. If you guessed for a week you'd fail on hitting on my object. I sent it to Jane! And as that money order left Schenectady for Brooklyn I experienced the most glorious sensation of my whole rotten life. I'd never felt so good before. Unconsciously I pushed out my chest, lifted up my head and looked my fellows in the eyes. Pride filled my heart and tears filled my eyes as I thought how proud and happy it would make Jane.

That tiny little bit of light was still aglow within me. It had succeeded in breaking out. It had manifested itself to the world.

THE job lasted four weeks, and at the end of that time I received my money, less the fifteen. It was a good-sized roll for me and I felt rich. Some years before it wouldn't have been a consequence. However, I bid the plant good-by reluctantly and, together with about a dozen more, began the trip down the Hudson by boat on the Night Line. No sooner were we aboard than the gang began to loosen up. Every one of us had plenty of money, and the boat carried plenty to drink of every description. I knew trouble was brewing and I decided to quit the gang. I remember I thought I'd walk uptown. Then I woke up! I was on a boat and couldn't get away. I'd have to stay right there and fight it out on the spot. I went out on deck and walked away, firm in my determination to let the stuff alone, come what might. Around and around the deck I went. Each time I passed my starting-point. Each time I passed it I felt stronger and better able to hold tight to my resolution. Each time I passed my starting-point I could look in at the bar and see my friends crowded in front of it. At last I was beating rum! But all the same the fight was a bitter one. Several times I was on the verge of going in to have "just one." For two hours the game went on like that and then just as I passed the bar entrance out lurched one of the gang, drunk as a lord and smelling like a distillery. He flopped right into my arms and invited me to come in and "'ave a smile." That invitation in itself didn't faze me a particle, but the smell of the fellow's breath was too much. It was like a red flag in front of a bull. My blood turned cold and then hot. My system was on fire. I could have won that fight, I'm sure, if it hadn't been for the smell of the booze.

I joined the gang and got beastly drunk. The stuff made me crazy and I didn't draw a sober breath until all of my "roll" had been "blowed"—about two weeks later. And before I had time to get thoroughly sober there was a strike in the Street Cleaning Department. Wadell & Mahon had the job, and I got a slice of it. Another long booze ended when the coin ended.

CHAPTER XX

In Which God Speaks to Me

IT'S a curious thing that from my last day at the lumber pile, which you will remember was a month or more earlier, I hadn't once been tempted to do any stealing, and not having been tempted I didn't steal. I can't account for it, but it's a fact. However, the desire came back strong after that big drunk following the Street Cleaning strike. When the time came that I had sobered up, a feeling of utter hopelessness came over me, and I gave up the fight. I figured I could never get back with my wife. For the first time in my life I admitted to myself that I was a failure. My feeling of shame and remorse and sorrow was so bitter I gave up the fight—I quit cold. I'd get a new "roll"—I'd find a sucker, and then I'd beat it for good and all.

I was in the back room of a saloon when I reached this decision. I planned a Western trip. Things were easier out there. Just then a strange thing happened. Like the day they'd taken me handcuffed to Sing Sing the big events in my life passed in review before my eyes. One by one I saw them. One by one they failed to move me—until last, like the first time, came the picture of my wife. This time, though, I first saw her as she had been when I married her, young, full of health and happy; and then I saw her as she looked the last time I'd seen her. Instantly my blood became afire—it boiled in anger and resentment against myself. I was all on edge, and there in that back room I cursed myself over and over again.

And then I quieted down. A new picture was before my eyes. I couldn't believe it, but there it was, flashing ever brighter before my eyes. It showed me standing in a room with a lot of men—men like myself—failures. A big man with a kindly face had his hand on my shoulder and was asking me if he could do anything for me!

With a start that shook me to the very foundation I realized that I needed that man right then. I knew it! At once I left the gin-mill and went uptown. Entering the Bowery Mission I asked for Dr. Hallimond.

He was confined to his home slightly ill.

I felt all in—heart-broken—ready to give up again. I wished I might die. As I was about to go down stairs and out on the street Charlie Balevre spied me and remembered me, not as John Goode, but as a man who had some time earlier taken a card, and then had dropped out of sight. He came right over to me with outstretched hand. He urged me to stay for the service and to come in regularly. He told me to come every day to the Labor Bureau and he would try and fix me up with enough work to keep me going until something permanent came along.

GOD is good! He spoke to me that night if ever he spoke to any one. I see it clearly as I now look back on it. My disgust with myself and my regret at failing to see Dr. Hallimond were sufficient to have driven me to anything. Charlie Balevre saved the day: he said just what I needed to hear and he did it just as Dr. Hallimond would have done it.

I went down stairs meekly and broken in spirit. I sang the hymns as I'd never sung them before and received great comfort and easement of mind from the service! They gave me a bed ticket and I was glad to take it, for I wanted to be alone where I could think!

The Alaska Dog Races

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from a ride on the pupmobile over the Dog Car railroad that carries one from Nome across the gold-bearing plains into the mountains of the interior. The track is a narrow gauge, built for steam engines by Charles D. Lane in 1900. The government tax on Alaskan railroads was too heavy to keep the cars running, and the road has now been given over to little cars drawn by dogs, the only cars now remaining on Seward Peninsula. These cars are known as pupmobiles. Each car consists of a platform on wheels with one or two rough seats fastened to it. The motor is a team of from seven to fifteen dogs, who are harnessed to the front of the car by means of a long rope, and directed by the voice of the driver, who calls out "Gee" to turn them to the right, "Haw" to turn them to the left, and "Mush" to make them go faster. At the front of the team is a leader, whose traces are fastened to the end of the rope, and behind him two abreast come the rest of the team, their traces tied to the rope at intervals, the last two being perhaps eight or ten feet from the car. Each dog has a harness much like that used for a horse, except that it just fits the dog. The collars are of soft leather, beautifully padded, and the tough leather traces are fastened to the collars and upheld by straps which run across the back of the dog. There are no bridles nor halters, and the sole direction is by the voice of the motorman. The dogs obey quickly, they are eager to go and seem to enjoy pulling the car.

A winning dog team at the end of a race, howling its triumph

Our ride was out over the tundra which lies between the foothills of the mountains and Bering Sea. The personal conductor was Mr. Fred M. Ayer of the Wild Goose Mining Company, who is noted as a mining engineer, and also as a dog fancier. The tundra consists of the decomposed vegetation under which is two or three feet of ice mixed with muck and blue clay. The blue clay makes it impossible to thaw out the ground, as is done at Dawson. There are many soft spots in the tundra filled with water, and many round masses of vegetation that turn as you step on them. The railway is drained, but in many places the road-bed has sunken, and water covers the track. At such places the dogs ran out on the banks to keep out of the water, and sometimes they made their way through the shallower pools, dragging the car. Now and then they broke into a gallop and we fairly flew over the rails. I am told they go twice as fast on the snow dragging a sled.

The dog races of Nome are the great sporting events of the far northwest. They are to Alaska what the Derby is to England. They are talked of from one year's end to the other, and as the time approaches the dogs which are to compete are the subjects of never-ending discussion. Thousands of dollars are put up on the races in the shape of bets, and nearly every one, man and woman, has a wager of some kind or other.

The whole country turns out to see the start and finish, and the winners are the heroes of the time. The great race is the all-Alaska sweepstakes, which is run from Nome, on Bering Sea, to Candle City, on the Arctic Ocean, and return. The distance is 408 miles and the usual winning time is between three and four days. In 1910 it was made by Colonel Ramsey's team in 74 hours 14 minutes and 42 seconds, and in 1913 by the Bowen-Delezene team in 75 hours 42 minutes and 27 seconds.

In addition to the all-Alaska sweepstakes there are annual races every March from Nome to the Solomon River and back. This is known as the Solomon Derby. It is for a distance of sixty-four miles. Last year that race was won by Mr. Ayer, whose dogs made the trip in 6 hours, making an average of about ten miles per hour. It took two men to hold the team when they were turned around at Solomon. They wanted to start right back, notwithstanding they had been running steadily at the rate of almost eleven miles an hour. The prize for that race was $150.

Among other features of the Solomon Derby was the Burden race, in which the dogs ran seventy-five miles, carrying one passenger and fifty pounds of baggage. The passenger in such races is usually a woman, the wife, daughter or sweetheart of the owner or driver. Last year the seventy-five miles were made in eight hours and five minutes. The year previous it was made in less than eight hours. Another burden race is run to Council City, eighty-six miles. This ends in a ball, the ladies being carried on the sleds by their best beaux to the dance.

The most of the racing of Alaska is under the direction of the Nome Kennel Club, which was founded by Albert Fink for the purpose of improving the dogs used to transport miners and supplies from one part of the country to another. This club was organized before racing was thought of, but the sport is doing much to improve the character of the animals.

DOGS have always been a very important part of the traffic of Alaska. They are to be found in and about every mining camp, and there are hundreds of them in every town. They are used in carrying the mails. During the long winter every postal card and every letter, newspaper and magazine that comes to Nome has to be brought over fifteen hundred miles of ice and snow by dog teams. The mail is taken from Fairbanks to Ruby, Iditarod and Fort Gibbon by dogs, and, in fact, the whole of the interior of this great territory is dependent upon dogs for its winter transportation. In the summer the dogs are sometimes used by the prospectors as pack animals and at the time of a gold stampede they rapidly rise in value. This is especially so if a stampede occurs during the winter. In the summer time you can get a good dog for $25. In the winter you may have to pay $100 for the same animal.

The carrying of the winter mail and express of Alaska is a regular business. There are men in every large town engaged in it and there are some who do nothing else but drive dog teams over the country. One of these men tells me that the winter freight is taken across the country on narrow sleds, about sixteen feet long. Such a sled will hold and stand up under a load of 800 pounds, and it will take from nine to nineteen dogs to haul it, according to the load. The mail is usually carried on sleds of that kind. The mail contractors are paid by the month, some of them making as much as $10 a day.

This man says that the McKenzie River husky is about the best all around trail dog to be found in the North. The husky, like the malamute, is a cross between a dog and a wolf, an animal long known in Alaska. It was used by the Indians before the Hudson Bay Company came to the northwest, and that was three centuries ago. The husky is very hardy, and it is noted for its good disposition. Said the mail contractor: "I once met a team of five McKenzie River huskies on the route from Nome to Skagway. They were then near Lake Bennett, and had already traveled 2,400 miles, dragging a sled carrying the driver and his outfit. Nevertheless, they were in perfect condition, and were galloping along. That was at the time of the great gold excitement.

"A good driver will save his team in every possible way. He will ride on the sled only when going down hill, and most of the time he will run in front of the sled, or between the dogs and the sled, keeping the sled in the trail by what is known as the gee-pole. During cold weather one would rather run or walk than ride. I have driven fifty-four miles in a day with the thermometer 53 degrees below zero. I ran almost the whole day, and at the end it seemed to me as though my lungs were scalded from top to bottom. I have traveled when the thermometer was 72 degrees below zero."

I asked this man, "How many hours can you drive in a day?"

"We try to make eight or ten hours, but it is often best to drive only six. The stops have to be made according to the trail and the roadhouses. We always shelter the dogs at night if possible, and most of the roadhouses have kennels for them. If there is no shelter the native dog will bury himself in the snow, or climb upon something above it.

The stories of Alaskan dogs are legion, and their deeds surpass those of the famous St. Bernards. One of these relates to Baldy of Nome, who saved the All-Alaska Sweepstakes for Scotty Allen, a famous driver in one of the great races to Candle City. Baldy was the leader of the team. During the race he felt that the sled was running light, and, looking back, could see no signs of his master. He thereupon, of his own accord, turned the team and went back over the trail several miles, where he found Scotty lying pale and unconscious on the snow. He had been struck by one of the iron posts put up by the government to mark the trail. The dog Baldy stopped and licked the pallid face of the senseless man. He then set up a howl and scratched away at Scotty's breast until the man came to, and, crawling back on the sled, motioned him to go on with the race. This Baldy did, and came out ahead.

This scene is on the Winter Trail near Nome. It is about the first picture in these articles to make one want to be in Alaska

A River of Ink

MOST of the great rivers of the world have their source in the melted snow of the mountains. In their flow some are blue, like the Danube, some yellow, like the Mississippi, others are colorless. A recent traveler describes in a London paper a river in Algeria which he says is as black as ink, and which he even claims is genuine ink. It is formed by the union of two streams, the water of one being impregnated with iron, and the other, which drains a great swamp, with gallic acid. This combination of iron and acid, it is claimed, makes a pure ink. It is a pity that that river is not closer to the market in these days of high cost of printing. In olden times they wrote on tablets with the stylus, and on parchment with ink. "Then Baruch answered them, He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book." (Jer. 36 : 18.)

She Saw Lafayette

MRS. W. W. HUBBELL, whose husband invented the time fuse for explosive shells, died in her ninety-eighth year at her home in Yonkers, N. Y., the other night. She was a bright woman intellectually, with a most remarkable memory. She told with the most careful detail how ninety-four years ago they lifted her up over the heads of the people so that she might get a look at the Marquis de Lafayette as he passed through the streets of Charleston, S. C. Her husband completed his invention of the time fuse and percussion cap before the Civil War. The fuse was first used at the battle of Antietam, and it was said that it contributed largely to the Union victory. Mrs. Hubbell's home in Charleston was in the line of Sherman's march to the sea. It was entirely destroyed, and her slaves scattered. In after years she often said that her husband's shells ruined her home and indirectly destroyed her fortune. Both inventions were sold to the government, and two bills have been introduced in Congress to obtain compensation for their use. It is expected that the heirs will receive the money that would have been granted by the government to Mrs. Hubbell. Mrs. Hubbell's memory, which went back ninety-four years, was reliable to the day of her death. In her vigor in old age, and in her longevity, she calls to mind this Scripture: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died; his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." (Deut. 34 : 7.)

Stole $75,000 from Employers

A CLERK who robbed his employers of $75,000 and over in two years, was arrested the other day, confessed his crime, and was held in the Jefferson Market prison, New York, to await the action of the Grand Jury. Though getting only $25 a week, he lived in a fine house on the fashionable West Side at a rental of $1,800; had furniture worth $35,000, two rugs worth $1,000 each, and three automobiles with a liveried chauffeur whom he paid the same salary he himself was getting. For two years he had quietly stolen about a thousand dollars a week with which he supported his luxurious home and had established a chain of cigar stores. It was only when the house felt that the export department under the clerk's care was making too little money out of its great business that the proprietors began to suspect their clerk. They found that he was wearing a shirt that cost $10. "Well, it's all over," he sighed to Lieutenant McConville, who led him to a cell. "I am glad it's over. It's been pretty much of a strain on me the past few months. I knew I couldn't keep it up, and I was glad when I was caught. When I come from prison I am going back to work and make restitution. But my poor wife, married only two years! What will she do now? Please do not blame her; she knew nothing about it. She thought my money came from the cigar stores." Strange to say, there were enough available assets of the stealings left to pay back $60,000 of the $75,000 stolen. The $25 clerk-thief in his disgrace got just what he deserved. It was the natural harvest from the kind of seed he sowed. He ought to be a warning to any dishonest clerks who may not be behind the bars, but are liable to be detected at any time, and to any who may be subjected to great temptation. It is to be hoped that the young man's penitence is genuine, and that he may yet carry out his plan to make restitution. The beginning of the year is a good time for the young man or woman, or older person who may have been guilty of any crime or sin, to turn over a new leaf in answer to this injunction, "Let him that stole steal no more." (Eph. 4 : 28.)

Illumination of Liberty Statue

ON the evening of December 2 President Wilson, Secretary Daniels, Mayor Mitchel and others went down the Hudson from Eighteenth Street pier to Bedloe's Island in New York harbor, on which the Statue of Liberty stands. At five minutes to six o'clock President Wilson, on board the Mayflower, gave a wireless signal, and as the giant statue leaped out of the darkness that had hidden her every night for thirty years, she was greeted by the cheers of hundreds of thousands of people who lined the banks of the harbor and the roar of boat whistles everywhere. There she stood, a green figure resting on a beautiful brown base, and instead of holding in her hand the wee light that mariners had seen for thirty years, she was effulgent in her magnificence. A spectacular feature of the illumination was an air flight by Miss Ruth Law around the statue. Thirty years ago the French government gave the statue to the United States, the money having been raised by popular subscription in France. The late Joseph Pulitzer, through the New York World, secured popular subscriptions for a pedestal. The World recently secured popular subscriptions to pay for the illumination of the whole statue. At a banquet at the Waldorf Astoria immediately after the illumination, presided over by Mayor Mitchel, speeches were made by Chauncey Depew, M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador, Ralph Pulitzer, N. L. Doherty and President Wilson, who in his address formally accepted the illuminating plant. Ambassador Jusserand said: "Not to a man, not to a nation, the statue was raised. It was raised to an idea—an idea greater than any man or any nation, greater than France or the United States, the idea of liberty. Still bleeding from recent wounds, France, then a republic, thought of the other republic on the opposite shore, and said: 'Sister, let us raise an emblem to what, in the midst of the conflict of appetites, desires, and passions, is uppermost in our minds: liberty. I am the older country, you are the older republic. We were friends from the earliest days; we fought together for independence. Let us raise a memorial to what has caused our friendship to endure; that is, our common love of liberty.'" May the illumination of the statue symbolize the increased light and glory of our American institutions and their influence on the nations of the world. "In him was life: and the life was the light of men." (John 1 : 4.)

The Undivided Heart

A WISE editorial in the Lutheran Work and Observer calls for an undivided heart in the minister, in these words, "Like other men, the minister can only do one thing and do it well. However great the temptation, however exceptional the opportunity, he must refrain from collecting wealth which he sees other men acquiring about him, and must himself preach the unsearchable riches of Christ, even though he die a poor man in the estimation of the world." Heavy expense and comparatively small salary tempt some ministers to outside money ventures, which nearly always prove failures. The few successes are likely to be at the expense of the spiritual in the man. From the ethical and economical standpoint as well, the minister should have the undivided heart thus expressed: "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." (I Cor. 2 : 2.)

Sonny Matthews' Body Found

SONNY MATTHEWS, a bright little boy of nine, neatly dressed, went out from his home in Chicago on a crisp day last February with his sled. He took a doughnut out of the jar and bought candy with the penny his mother gave him. He never came back. He was searched for by his parents all over the land. A reward of $1,000 was offered for his return. Pretenders claimed they would return him for pay. The mother looked for him every day and put a light in the window for him every night. The parents almost died with the suspense. The other day the body of the dear boy was found in the edge of Lake Michigan. He had been warned many times to keep off the frozen lake, but in coasting he had slipped through the ice and was drowned. The parents know now that their darling boy is not lost, but found; and they can repeat these words spoken by another: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." (II Sam. 12 : 23.)

Bryan on Prohibition

ONE of the most significant declarations in the history of modern American politics was that of William Jennings Bryan in favor of national prohibition, made at a banquet in Washington given in his honor on the evening of December 6, by 300 of the congressmen and senators of his political faith. In his address, after opposing the Federal ownership of railroads, and asking for an election of the President by a direct vote of the people, and for woman suffrage, he closed by saying: "I have saved for the last the reform which will involve the fiercest contest, and which, when accomplished, will bring the largest benefit; namely, abolition of the saloon. I did not expect till within four years to live to see the time when it would be an acute national question. But owing to causes that no one could foresee, the issue has been precipitated upon us, and must be met. The injurious effect of alcohol upon the system has been known for ages, but three impulses have recently added to the momentum with which the cause moves forward. Science, religion and war have joined forces against King Alcohol. Twenty-three states have already prohibited the open saloon, two-thirds of them within the last four years. The Democratic party, having won without the aid of the wet cities, and having received the support of nearly all the Prohibition states, and the states where women vote, is released from all obligation to the liquor traffic. It is free to take the moral side of this great moral issue, and I have no doubt that it will live up to its opportunities and obligations." As two Republicans to one voted for the resolution of national prohibition in Congress, the prediction for a dry nation in 1920 now looks among the possibilities. On this question let the individual and the party obey this injunction, "Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good." (Rom. 12 : 9.)

A Model Prison

ILLINOIS is building at Joliet a new prison plant, which is said to exemplify all of the modern ideas in prison construction. The plant is being built by the convicts themselves, and is to be a part of a prison farm of 2,200 acres, upon which the prisoners will raise all the produce used to feed the inmates of the penitentiary and supply also some of the state charitable institutions. The new cell-houses are circular, each cell will receive sunshine and each will be an individual room. It was prophesied that Christ should "proclaim . . . the opening of the prison." (Isa. 61:1.)

Jesus the Life and Light of Men

International Sunday School Lesson for January 7, 1917. John 1 : 1-18

The Gospel According to John

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

FOR the next six months we are to take our lessons from the Fourth Gospel, perhaps the best loved of all Bible books, and also one that has given rise to many difficult questions and to discussions of great interest in philosophy and theology. Therefore it is a splendid thing to get before our minds the chief purpose of the book as stated by our first lesson topic: "Jesus the Life and Light of Men." To be a bit more exact, we must ask just what the writer set out to do. He tells us frankly, and his own words are the best: "These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life in his name." His purpose was evangelistic. Out of "many things" he selected these with this purpose in mind: to manifest the Christ so compellingly that men may believe and enter his light. His purpose was philanthropic in the truest sense of the word.

It is significant that John did not set out to convince men by argument, but simply to show forth that matchless Person who had won him and his associates. We err when we descend from manifesting his glory and testifying of Jesus to mere controversy and logic-chopping. John knew better. Therefore his book remains, precious to all, when labored apologetics are forgotten.

A Distinctive Point of View

ONE can see at once a distinct difference between the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke) and John's. Every man has his own point of view. John's is accentuated by the vista of the years, for it is certain that he wrote long after the others. The scenes he selects and describes are accentuated in memory by decades of Christian life and preaching. The chapters are homilies, little sermons on the career of Christ. It is a subjective Gospel—a fruit of much meditation and prayer—yet it is undoubtedly true to the real Jesus who called John to come and see. Through the mist of the past he remembers the words and the very time of day, the tenth hour (John 1 : 39).

Some one has well described the Gospel of Mark as a series of snapshots of the Master at work, while the Gospel of Matthew is a carefully posed photograph of the Messiah against the background of Hebrew prophecy. If this is true, then the Gospel of John is a marvelous painting by an artist who knew the soul of his subject—a portrait cherished in the mind and only committed to canvas long after the subject had ascended to the Father. This helps us to realize at once the power and the limitations of the Fourth Gospel. It was not intended to be meticulously historical, but to show forth in all his majesty the Lord of Life. Consequently, while it has perplexed the minds of careful scholars as to details, it has always rejoiced the hearts of even the lowliest followers of the great Redeemer of the World.

Some Questions Answered

PERHAPS there will be some hard questions that will come up in your own mind regarding this book. Inasmuch as we are to give it so thorough a study and it is so highly important a book, you would do well to buy one of the best commentaries.

1. Why does John omit the Beatitudes and Sayings on the Mount, as well as the great parables? Is it not because they were already given by the Three Gospels, which he had read, and which perchance were before him as he wrote?

2. Does not John make the chief scene of Jesus' work Judea, while the others show it as Galilee? Yes; but John gives frequent notes of sojourns in Galilee which he does not describe. Possibly because already treated by the Three, or because John wants to show how "his own received him not." He may have been the only one familiar with the Judean ministry at the feast times—we could ill spare the interview with Nicodemus, and the man born blind, and Lazarus of Bethany.

3. Which Gospels give us the best outlines of Christ's life? Surely Mark and those which follow his plan (Matthew, Luke). John indeed spends half his chapters on the closing scenes.

4. How much of Jesus' life does John cover? Careful study will show that it comprises incidents of not much more than twenty days.

A Working Outline of the Fourth Gospel

PROLOGUE. The Word Made Flesh. Chapter 1, verses 1–18.

Part One. The Manifestation of the Light. Chapters 1 to 4. Testimony of witnesses, of signs, of teachings. The Saviour of the World revealed.

Part Two. The Rejection of the Light. Chapters 5 to 12. A record of growing hostility. Rejection of Sabbath views, of Bread of Life, of Living Water, of Light of the World, of Good Shepherd, of Resurrection Life.

Part Three. The Intimate Ministry to the Twelve. Chapters 13 to 17. Questions answered: Peter's, Thomas's, Philip's, Judas's. Not servants but friends. The prayer.

Part Four. Betrayal, Trial and Crucifixion. Chapters 18 and 19.

Part Five. The Risen Lord. Chapters 20 and 21. At Jerusalem—Doubt overcome. In Galilee—Faith restored.

Today's Truth the Central Message

FIRST of all, this book was written to set forth Jesus Christ as the Life and Light of men. The Prologue is an introduction to the whole thought of the Gospel. It begins with an expression more comprehensible to either Greek or Jew than to any but well-educated moderns—the Word or Logos. They were both familiar with the thought of a manifestation of God, a sort of bridge between God and the world. Certainly, said John; but not some mere abstraction of philosophy, but a real creative principle in the Godhead. A means of communion between God and man, was the Hebrew thought. Yes, indeed, said John; but an actual personality, manifest in history, a Man whom we saw and knew and loved.

This was the new thing in Christianity: God manifest in the flesh. No abstract figment of speculation, but an actual person, who was born, lived, and died. It is so practical, so unescapable. No man can argue away this absolute fact—that the man Christ Jesus really lived; he impressed his associates as the incarnate deity, as being so like God that the only metaphor competent to express it is "the only Son of a Father." Beholding his glory in daily life, a new principle entered their lives; grace, the grace of the Lord Jesus, having a power not found in the Law of Moses. Light on the meaning of life and moral strength to live upon the basis revealed are the gifts of Grace. Rejected, crucified, he nevertheless was, and is, the Light of the World, the Life of men. Risen in spiritual power, he has become the world's greatest force for character and redemption. He is the Hope of the Human Race.

"Subtlest thought shall fail and learning falter,
Churches change, forms perish,
systems go;
But our human needs, they will not alter,
Christ no after age shall e'er outgrow.

"Yea, Amen. O changeless One, Thou only
Art life's guide and spiritual goal;
Thou the Light across the dark vale lonely,
Thou the eternal Haven of the soul."

Importance of the Incarnation

THIS Gospel forever establishes the essential unity of the divine and the human. There is no impassable gulf between the Holy God and his creation as the Neo-Platonists thought. There is nothing essentially abhorrent to God in the flesh of man as ascetics teach. He can manifest himself therein above all the glories of the celestial. Humanity at its best, spirit-filled, is the veritable revelation of the Eternal Father. Divinity, unqualified, can be manifested most clearly in a human life. Jesus was indisputably divine, the very image of the ineffable glory. Yet he was thoroughly human, a real man, not a weird hybrid—a vital, vibrant personality—brother to all who love and to all who suffer. This is the meaning of the mighty central doctrine of John, the Incarnation.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Ass'n

The Class Use of the Bible

THE successful teacher of a class of twenty-five Intermediate boys answers this question:

> We have a Bible drill each Sunday before the lesson is taken up. The reason is obvious. It gets each boy to bring his Bible. It trains him to find different parts of the Bible with ease.

All of the teachers heard from who are in the Junior Department emphasize the eagerness of the scholars to do Bible drill and memory work and to look up references. A junior teacher writes:

> Children find references called for; also learn books of the Bible so they may find the place with facility. The superintendent and scholars use the Bible in responsive reading of scripture.

A teacher of sixteen-year-old girls:

> Each has her Bible. After speaking of a Bible verse they look it up and write it in their note-books.

A teacher from Colorado writes:

> Bible-bringing is a big point in our school. And I make them use them each Sunday.

A teacher from Columbus, Ohio, says:

> We have class Bibles. When the lesson is topical we use references, and sometimes parallel passages, or connecting links.

A Kansas teacher of men writes:

> Nearly all bring their Bibles. We use it through a good deal of research and in the discussion of various passages.

Another Kansas teacher writes:

> Yes, they bring them, for they never know when I am going to have to use them.

Still another Kansas teacher says:

> We always bring them. We open them first thing, and refer to them throughout the lesson.

A teacher of twelve-year-old Juniors:

> We have the regular Sunday school Bibles, one for each child, on the table. Since we are studying every day verses and not Bible characters, we have no references to look up, but I have a drill every Sunday on quickness in finding whatever book in the Bible is called for.

Another teacher has this plan:

> Yes, they bring their Bibles and use them constantly during the lesson study, and the last ten minutes of our lesson period is always devoted to a Bible drill.

The Bible drill plan is used by another teacher, who writes:

> Yes, we read the Bible lesson, and often have Bible drills, finding books and verses.

Another says:

> The younger children take pride in having their Bibles with them in order to mark the memory verses and look up given references.

One teacher of older girls writes:

> Every girl brings her Bible every Sunday afternoon. If they leave them home they cannot enter into the contest which we have quite frequently after the lesson, and for this reason, the girls do not think of coming without their Bibles. For the purpose of training them to find the books of the Bible readily when we have time after the lesson, I divide the class into two sides, then call out the name of some book in the Bible, and every girl hastens to find it. Whoever finds it first gains a point for the side she is on. This has proved quite interesting. We keep score, and of course each side works to win. It is surprising how much more able they are to find the different books in an instant than they were at the start.

Another teacher secures results by marking for Bible-bringing in the school's honor system.

Another assigns passages the week previous.

A teacher of fifteen-year-old girls says: "Yes, many of them bring them, and we use them when we wish to prove an assertion or make sure of a quotation or opinion."

In an adult class the following plan is used:

> We read in concert a verse from the Bible or several verses. I sometimes read, for instance, a question and have the class follow me, and when I stop they read the answer.

This plan is especially valuable where, as in the Gospels, the verse lends itself to a natural division, such as: (Teacher) "Jesus said unto them," and the class reads the words of Christ to complete the verse.

A large number of the teachers consulted have the scholars use the Bibles for reference work.

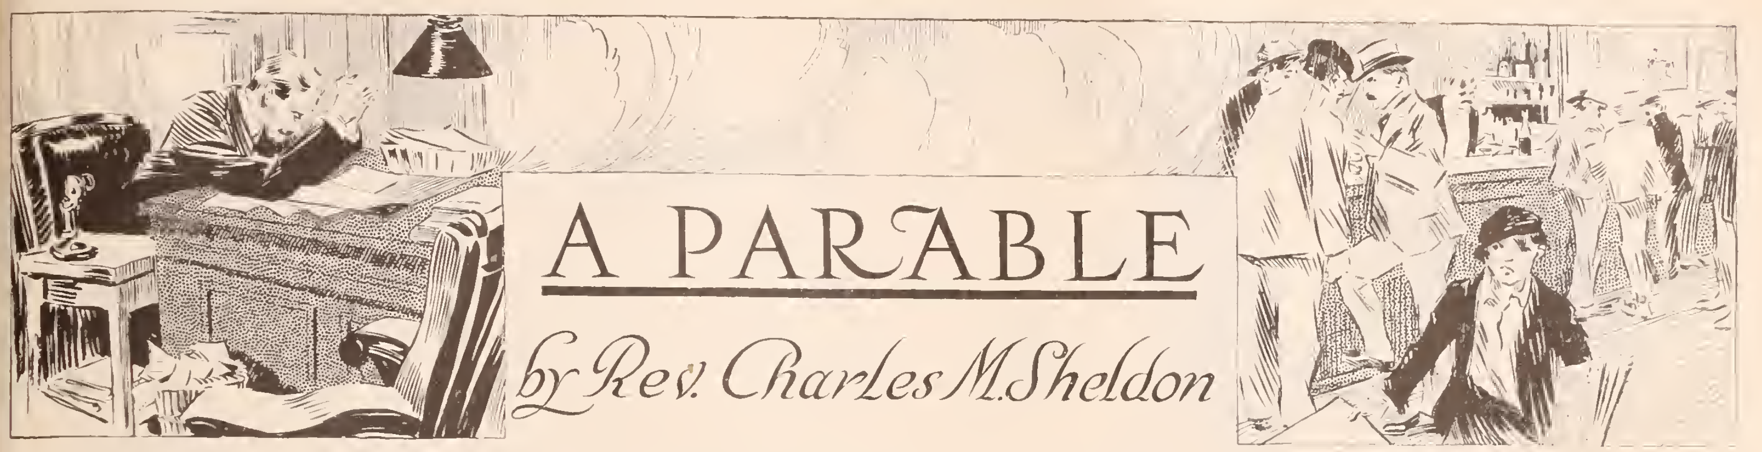
Among the Workers

THE Seventh Annual New York State Convention of Baraca-Philathea classes met at Johnstown, New York, November 5–7. Reports to the convention showed that in the year the number of affiliated classes had increased from 1,100 to 1,300, the number of city and county Unions from 7 to 14, and the goal of 5,000 young men and women won for Christ had been passed, one class reporting twenty-five conversions. The convention pledged the classes of the state to win another 5,000 in 1917, and the goal for the next year was set at 2,000 organized classes.

A TRAINING school for Sunday school teachers has been established at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City, under the direction of Professor James C. Egbert of Columbia University. The school is interdenominational and is open to Sunday school teachers of all denominations of the greater city. A course of lectures will be given on Monday evenings and will extend to April 23, 1917.

REV. DR. L. W. MUNHALL has become the associate editor of The Eastern Methodist of Philadelphia, a new publication, and is carrying the same vigor and spiritual energy into his work that has characterized his career as preacher and evangelist.

THERE is no age limit to the work of Grace. The Christian Herald is advised that on March 10, 1898, Heman Keyes of Pittstown, N. Y., who though 94 years old had never before made confession of faith in Christ, was baptized and became a member of the Baptist church. He was a faithful attendant until he died at the age of 98.



A PARABLE

by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon

ONCE on a time there was a Business Man in a certain town who believed that the only way to handle the Liquor Traffic was to regulate it and license it. He said it was too great and powerful to kill entirely, and it was best to get some revenue from a necessary evil.

One evening just as he was getting ready to leave his office and go home, he had an unexpected visitor.

"You will excuse me for coming at this time," said the visitor, "but I shall not trouble you long and I may never come again."

"Who are you?" asked the Business Man in astonishment; for he had never in all his life seen a person so beautiful and at the same time so sad.

"I AM one of the angels from heaven," said the visitor. "I have been sent here by my Lord to see how the children of God live in their cities and to ask them a few questions. Will you answer some of them?"

"If I am able," faltered the Business Man as he gazed in awe at his heavenly visitor.

"Tell me, then, the exact truth. I do not want you to tell me what you have been brought up to believe, but the real facts. First of all, you have a thing in this city called a saloon. What is a saloon?"

"A place where intoxicating liquor is sold."

"What is intoxicating liquor?"

"A beverage made from alcohol."

"What is alcohol?"

"A chemical made from various grains and plants."

"Is it good for the human body?"

"Oh, no. It is a poisonous drug."

"What effect does it have on the human being?"

"It makes him drunk."

"What is that?"

"When a man is drunk he loses his reason."

"What does he do in that condition?"

"Sometimes he commits murder. He has even been known to kill his own wife and babies while drunk."

"What other things does alcohol do?"

"It makes thousands of people insane and causes thousands more to be born defectives. It creates pauperism, crime, and lust. It beggars families, destroys health, robs men and women of natural affection, fills the ranks of those who have to be cared for at public expense, and breaks the hearts of fathers and mothers. It creates licentious passions and leads thousands of innocent girls into lives of shame. It is mankind's most terrible enemy, destroying mind, body and soul."

"Why, then, is such a thing as a saloon allowed to exist in this city?"

"Because it is licensed."

"Who does that?"

"The people."

"Do business men license the saloon?"

"Yes."

"Do they license any other institution to commit crimes against humanity?"

"No."

"Is there any place on earth where making and selling alcohol is called a crime and forbidden?"

"Oh, yes. All Russia forbids it as a crime. Also nineteen states in this country."

"Is it called a crime by law?"

"Yes, the highest court we have has repeatedly so declared."

"Why do you license a saloon to commit these crimes?"

"To get the revenue."

"What is that?"

"The license fee."

"How much is that?"

"One thousand dollars a year."

"How many saloons have you here in this place?"

"One hundred."

"How much money is spent in them for alcohol?"

"Two million dollars a year."

"Does the license fee come out of that?"

"Yes."

"Does the saloon pay for the expense of taking care of the public charges caused by its drink?"

"Oh, no."

"Who does?"

"We do."

"What does it cost to take care of all the wrecks in this town made by alcohol?"

"Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year."

"Give an illustration."

"Ohio, with all its revenue from saloons in Cincinnati, has one pauper to every three hundred and sixty-six people. Kansas, without one cent of revenue, has only one pauper to two thousand nine hundred people."

"Do business men call that good business?"

"Many of them do."

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"Would you license a gang of burglars to break into so many banks in this town every year for a license fee in order to get a revenue from a crime?"

"Of course not."

"Does professional burglary do as much harm to society as the saloon?"

"Not a hundredth part as much."

"Why, then, do you license one and not the other?"

"I don't know."

"Is a saloon a good place for a man to go into?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because in most of them there are pictures so vile that if a citizen tried to send them through the United States mails this government would put him in the penitentiary."

"Can you name any good thing about the saloon?"

"No. Only the revenue we get out of it."

"What revenue do you get?"

"One hundred thousand dollars a year."

"But you said you paid two millions a year into the saloon."

"Yes."

"And you said it cost you two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year to take care of the defectives caused by the alcohol sold by the saloon."

"Yes."

"And you also said the people also paid into the saloon the one hundred thousand dollars called revenue?"

"Yes."

"Where, then, do you get any revenue?"

The Business Man was silent, and the angel's face grew as sad as the face of God when a father walks into the door of a saloon and then stumbles into the door of his home to beat into pulp the most beautiful thing in the world.

And still the Business Man was silent.

THE angel's face looked wistful, but he did not speak. The Business Man looked wistfully back. The heavenly visitor disappeared. And the Business Man thought that a tear from the angel's eye fell upon his hand.

But it was a tear from his own eye.

And he rose and softly closed the door of his office, and then he kneeled at his desk and for the first time in his life he asked God's forgiveness and pledged his business life to make his city so beautiful that if the Angel ever came back he would smile through his tears at a city clean and holy, made so by the Business Man who had caught a vision of the truth about the American Saloon.

AND NOW COMES THE NEW YEAR - - - - -

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

A FLASH of snow, a gust of wind, and lo, the New Year comes; while winter rages all about, while sullen, muffled drums sound out to us from far away across the raging sea, the New Year comes. God grant it bring a smile to you and me!

Some say the New Year is a Boy with wisdom in his eyes. Some say that he and Fate are one, but, oh, the Old Year dies. He passes over, bent and worn, into eternal space, and always comes another Year, with wisdom on his face. Some say the New Year is a page in God's great book of life—a page presented white and fair that we may mar with strife, or cover with illumined words or thrill with hearts aflame—a page that may be touched with light or dulled with blackest shame. And no one may erase his page, although the page be marred with blots and tears, though thoughtless deeds have made it rough and scarred!

If one might pierce behind the veil that hides the coming year, I wonder if the sight would be a visioning of fear? Or if there would be sunny days and songs to light the heart, and happiness and smiles and cheer to make the laughter start? (Some lips have long been white with dread and cold with awful fear.) Ah, if we could but pierce the veil, and watch the coming year!

I KNOW a tiny little girl, her name is Maisie Jones; and happiness, a bird-like note, goes thrilling through her tones. Whenever Maisie speaks or sings, the folk are filled with joy. But not a thousand miles away, I know a little boy. His name is Jimmy Percy Smith and everywhere he goes, he carries with him endless griefs, and glooms, and doubts, and woes! When Jimmy Percy Smith is near, why, people run away; and when he goes to call he hears, "They are not in today!" For Jimmy Percy Smith is cross and whiny as can be; and when folk see him coming they are very apt to flee.

Now, Maisie Jones has got a rule, and on each New Year's day, she says (the cunning little girl!) "I'll live the year this way: I won't do anything, perhaps, that will be grand to do; but oh, I'll sing and laugh and smile! I'll help somebody through! Through gloomy, sorry, winter-days when cares are deep as snow! I'll try to bring a bit of cheer when tempests scream and blow. I'll help my mother mend the clothes, and care for baby brother, and tell the twins they mustn't fight (Christ said, 'Love one another!') I'll read to grandma afternoons because her eyes are failing—I will not fret or pout or cry, I'll waste no time in wailing. My resolutions are not much—things any one could do!" For Maisie is a modest child, and all her words ring true with love and faith. She is a child who always likes to say a tiny heartfelt word of cheer in just the sweetest way.

BUT little Jimmy Percy Smith, when New Year's Day comes round, sits down and scowls and thinks quite hard and kicks the harmless ground (he has two stubby copper toes), and then he takes a pad and writes his resolutions down (the foolish little lad!). He says, "I'll do great deeds this year, I'll make folks proud of me! I'll be the smartest boy in school, now just you wait and see! How very bright I'll be in class! I'll rise up top, you bet, and all the other kids'll be so jealous that they'll fret. They'll all get mad, but I don't care, for like a king I'll rule! And teacher'll say to me, 'You are the bestest boy in school!' I'll go and hunt for Indians and kill and scalp a few (which only moving picture men are brave enough to do). I'll find a gold mine in the West, and sink a pirate craft; and then I'll go an' fight the wrong and rid the world of graft. And folks will tip their hats and say, 'What would we all have done, if Jimmy Percy's ma and pa had never had a son?'"

So Jimmy Percy Smith writes out a list a whole yard deep. And then somebody speaks to him and he begins to weep. He says, "I won't! I tell you, no! Now just you let me be!" For not a word of what he writes is really meant, you see! He never gets ahead in school, he'd be afraid to go across the plains to seek for gold, because if it should snow, his feet might get a little wet and he might catch a cold. He doesn't know the right from wrong, he isn't brave and bold.

SO oftentimes it is the way that people who are good, who always say the pleasant word and do the things they should, don't bother much to write a page of resolutions down. They live the page and make it glow with joy, while others frown, and tell what they will do some day, but some day never gleams, and so they write, and write some more, and spend a life in dreams.

"KIND hearts are more than coronets"—our copy books once said, and, talking of the book of life, the sentence might have read, "A clean and spotless page a year, oh, better far would be than something decorated up to hide the blots we see!" But if you've left a blotted page, the New Year brings to you a chance to make another page, a page of dreams come true.

So let us all do little things, and do not let us lag behind the moving stream of life, and do not let us brag. Don't shout the wonders you'll unfold; be kind and good and true; and there may be a crown of fame to wear ere life is through.

A FLASH of snow, a gust of wind—the New Year comes again; and happiness is in its van, and love, and care, and pain; and war, with outstretched fiendish arms and high-flung battle-cries, and poverty to wring the heart before our very eyes. And some of us may stumble, fall, before the year is through; and some may earn undying fame; one of them may be you! And joy may come to saddened hearts a merry tune to beat. A rainbow path may stretch on high for many weary feet.

God grant the New Year bring to us a song, a prayer, a smile, and bravery to meet the day and do the deed worth while.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THERE is a story told of a good man who, forced to choose a boon from heaven, chose to do much good of which he should never know. The Christian Herald Prayer League might well make a similar choice, for it is impossible for the League to know the good it does. And it is better so. If we knew, we might forget that the good has come through God's Spirit working in us, and we might be tempted to overrate our own meager powers, and to leave God out of the account, becoming by this at once both ungrateful and powerless. The hearts bowed down which by our prayers have been helped up again; the dark hopelessness which has been shot through with the light of God's certain promises; the pain that has been healed or failing that the pain that has found abundant recompense in a deeper knowledge of the things of God; the shattered lives that God's grace has restored; the separations that have ended in reunion—of these we cannot know, but now and then the curtain lifts a little and we catch just a glimpse of what the Prayer League and its ministry of intercession are doing in the world.

M. A., Santa Cruz, Calif., writes that though still suffering from the pain for release from which she has prayed, God has led her to a full assurance of her pardon through his grace. She is able to testify, "I know in whom I have believed." To her there is now no uncertainty about it, and now she wishes that she could bring to others this full assurance of saving faith that is hers. She feels that perhaps God might use her in helping those who ask through the League for deeper works of grace. She asks that the League pray for her that God may lead her into ways of service, and that, if it be his will, she may be saved from pain and restored to health again.

B. N., Bells, Tenn., writes: "I am a poor Shut-in, and I want the prayers of all."

Mrs. M. A. W., Auburn, N. Y., asks prayer for a family in dire need, living in tents near Cooper, Ark. The father has broken down, the mother is critically ill, and the six children are ill-clothed and unable to go to school. She asks the League to pray that God may heal their diseases and enable them to secure a more suitable home.

Mrs. M. T. W., Bloomington, Ill., asks prayers for herself that she may be healed of an illness, and she asks prayer also that her son, who has been wronged by business associates, may secure restitution.

Mrs. P. F. writes to praise God for the conversion of her son and his salvation from drink in answer to her prayers. She writes to comfort the mother whose heartbroken appeal was presented to the League four weeks ago.

H. E. C., at present paying the price of drink in a state prison, writes in answer to the same appeal. He tells how his mother's prayers followed him in his life of recklessness until at last he found the Saviour, but only after sin had cost him his home and his liberty. He asks prayer that he and his wife and child may be reconciled and reunited in a Christian home when he gains his release from prison.

E. N. praises God for the healing of his sister, who was at the point of death with pneumonia when the League was asked to pray for her recovery. Now he asks that prayer be made for her that she may be helped mentally and spiritually.

Mrs. L. B. S. requests prayer for a family in her town, whose three children are not attending Sunday school because there is no church of the denomination to which the parents belong, the children even being sent to bed without the evening prayer, and growing up with no knowledge of Christian things. She asks prayer that the parents may feel the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit, and be made willing to send their family to a Sunday school of a denomination not their own. She sends also one of a pack of playing cards which bears on its back the picture of a little boy saying his evening prayer on his mother's lap, which she says is one of the playthings of the three-year-old of this family. She feels that cards of this kind do not furnish the right amusement for a little child of this age.

C. A. K., Kansas City, Mo., asks prayer "that a minister may be sent to our church;" A. S. C., North Leverett, Mass., that a way may be opened to keep pastor; that nothing may prevent him staying with us. M. N. asks prayer that the church at Edina, Minn., may keep their pastor.

Mrs. L. J. B. Friends have asked us how to start a local prayer league. The prayer league is a voluntary association of people who have covenanted together to be in prayer at the noon hour each day. If several members of the Prayer League in the same town feel that they could gain strength and help from a local organization, such an organization may be formed in the way most convenient. The simpler the organization, however, the better. Such a league could hold meetings in the afternoon or in the evenings as best suits the members. They would find it interesting and profitable to study one of several books on prayer which we will be glad to recommend to those interested.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

New Concord, Ohio; Gagetown, Mich.; Arlington, Wash.; Portland, Ore.; Frankfort, Ind.; Durango, Colo. (for the success of revival meetings held at Eureka. Kan.); Eaton, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival); Mound Valley, Kan. (pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the members and entire community); Allentown, Ohio (that many may be saved during a union revival meeting).

Miss B. K., Elgin, N. D. (that some good minister may be sent to us); Mrs. A. F., Madison Heights, Va. (that a minister may be sent to our church).

Two parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; Mrs. M. A. K. asks prayer that a little girl's mind may be restored; M. L., that a wife's mind may be restored; Miss M. H. B., that sister's and own mind may be strengthened; twelve friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives, friends or themselves.

Four friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened; A. E. D. asks prayer that pastor's eyes may be healed; ten friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Thirty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; two wives, their husbands; seven, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

E. A. asks prayer that brother may be cured of the drug habit; Mrs. C. W. M. asks prayer to be cured of the drug habit; Mrs. B. R., that brother may be cured.

Mrs. N. M. W. asks prayer for the conversion of son and that she may hear from him; sixteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; fourteen wives, their husbands; thirty-four, for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Twelve readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

Sixty-three ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. W. M. K., that mother may be healed without an operation; fifty-three friends, for healing for themselves. Eight friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Twenty-four ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Sixty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including Mrs. A. J. B., that the Bible may be placed in all public schools in the state of Illinois.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. C. S. S., Pittsfield, Mass.; Fellow Member, New York City; B. W., Overlea, Md.; Mother, Fall River, Mass.; Reader, Pinewood, S. C.; Mrs. H. M. S., Mechanicsburg, Pa.; Mrs. A. B. W., Tazewell, Va.; Mrs. E. P. H., Denver, Colo.; J. L. A., Hampton, N. J.; Mrs. P., Mountain Grove, Mo.; Mother, Meridian, Miss.; Reader, Illinois; O. L. V., Alva, Okla.; Mrs. M. C., Muskegon, Mich.; Mrs. H. J. K., Glenwood, Minn.; J. B. M., Spokane, Wash.; E. S., McPherson, Kan.; J. R., Greenville, N. Y.; Mrs. O. T. S., Fostoria, Ohio; J. P. B., Waynesville, N. C.; C. N. H., Indianapolis, Ind.

Young People's Topics for January 7

Lifting Our Hearts Godward

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 55 : 6; Psa. 37 : 4; Luke 18 : 1; Matt. 15 : 21–28. (Morning Watch Enrolment.)

IT is very fitting that we should take the first hour of the day for communion with God. The day is new, the rising sun discloses a world freshened by the coolness of night and by the dew of evening which remains to glisten in the first rays of the morning light. Sleep has covered the cares of yesterday, and those of today are well on the other side of breakfast. Our mind is clear, our heart open. God seems near at such a time and communion is easy. God is near at all times, but communion comes less naturally in the heat of the day's work, while our hearts are often dull and our minds often unresponsive when at evening, weary, sleepy, we take up the Book of books and try to listen to its message. Better far perform our "morning watch" at hurried noon or heavy evening than to miss it and let pass a day from which Christ has been left out. But why not make a special effort, plan definitely, to have the necessary fifteen minutes when the day is new? After all, for most of us it merely means to change a haphazard getting up to an orderly arising with a purpose. That in itself is worth while. It is also worth while to know yourself one of the goodly company of "Comrades of the Morning Watch." There is strength in numbers, there is inspiration in a common aspiration, in united effort. And more: the daily worship will give new meaning to those habitual means of grace, church, Sunday school, and prayer meeting, which may be attended faithfully with ultimate spiritual atrophy if our worship ceases to be personal.

Are You Evading Moral Issues?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Matt. 12 : 22–30. (Consecration meeting.)

IT might be safe to say yes to the implied accusation of this question, for most of us are. There is a natural human antipathy against meeting issues. We sidestep them, we argue around them; we satisfy our consciences, or try to, with the husks of specious argument, of facts distorted, perhaps only slightly, but enough to suit our purposes. Some years ago there was a man in a Western city who was both a leading member of his church and chairman of the committee of his party in his portion of the state. He was honorable to the last degree in his personal life and correct in all his acknowledged beliefs; but at every election time he laid in a supply of $2 bills, which he distributed to his party workers for use in buying votes. Two dollars was the established price of a man-sized vote, and both parties, knowing the market, scrambled for the merchandise thereof. When urged by his minister to stop the practice, he replied that that would give the election to the other party. When urged further to take such action at the polls as would effectively stop the practice, he declared that ways would be found to evade the law, and that the other party would still win. He hid his conscience behind the assurance that the purchase of votes was a necessary evil that could not be abated, that must therefore be borne with, and that it was in any event a lesser evil than would be the otherwise inevitable triumph of the other party. When a courageous county prosecutor finally put an end to the practice, this man was one of the first to publicly commend him, but through years of active political life he had evaded this moral issue, and he knew it all the time. Christ says a house divided against itself can not stand. He wants all of our allegiance, and he wants it now. Some one will right the wrong. Some one will have courage to face the issue. Why not you? Face these moral issues in Christ's name, face them squarely, and you will be surprised at the ease with which you conquer. Satan is fond of frightening Christians with this bogy-man of apparently dangerous moral responsibility.

But Satan himself is more afraid of truth than any man is of trouble and we may meet our temptations to moral compromise and may overcome them victoriously by standing true.

What would he give for the coffee you serve?

Like a million other women, you can serve coffee that he would give most anything to have—coffee which starts the day "right" for all.

Everyone loves the rich flavor of Arbuckles' Coffee. Of all the coffees in America today, it is by far the most popular!

One woman says: "My husband used to swallow his coffee and hurry off. Now we have Arbuckles' and you'd think it was Sunday the way he lingers over his breakfast."

Until you try Arbuckles' you will never know what a difference good coffee can make in your home.

Today there are whole towns where Arbuckles' is practically the only coffee used. In one State, alone, in a year, four pounds of Arbuckles' Coffee was used for every man, woman and child in the State—four times as many pounds of coffee as the population of the State! Arbuckle Bros., New York.

Merry Moments

WHEN the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

AN EAR FOR MUSIC. A little girl five years old was on her way to the beach for the first time. Her numberless questions as to the ocean, the fish, ships, sailors, etc., had embarrassed her mother and amused the passengers. The train finally neared the wharf where we were to take a steamer and as we glided along very near the shore for a short distance we could plainly hear the swish, swish! of the waves. The little girl turned from the window with a beaming face.

"Listen!" she exclaimed; "I think I hear the fishes!"

EQUAL TO THE DEMAND. "I never use any but pasteurized milk in the city," said the new boarder; "can you furnish it?"

"Yes, indeed!" was the confident reply; "our cows 're kept in the pasture all summer."

IT WAS NOT HER FAULT. Dr. Black: "I suppose, Mrs. Brown, that you have given the medicine according to directions."

Mrs. Brown: "Well, doctah, I done my bes'; you said give Pete one o' dese heah pills three times a day ontil gone but I done run ont o' pills yistaday, an' 'e hain't gone yit."

A MATTER OF PUNCTUATION. A bachelor had been persuaded by the Ladies' Aid of a church to speak at an entertainment provided they would furnish him with subject matter. In a spirit of mischief he had been given as subject, "Woman: without her, man would be a savage."

On the night of the entertainment he arose and said, "My subject, which I consider a very fine one, is nevertheless not of my own choosing, but has been furnished me by the ladies, and is -Woman, without her man, would be a savage."

PURELY SURFACE INDICATIONS. Charlotte came into the yard looking very sweet and pretty and quite conscious of the fact

"I am prettier than you, ain't I?" she said to a man who was working in the yard.

"That depends on how you behave," he replied, saying "If you don't behave you won't be pretty."

She looked him over critically, expressing as her conclusion, "My, but you must have been naughty."

A BLOW FROM (OR AT) THE BENCH. "Your honor," informed the policeman as he pointed to the prisoner, "he refused to rise while the band played 'The Star Spangled Banner.'"

"I did not recognize the tune," explained the culprit hastily.

"Now, my dear man," said the judge sympathetically, "let me whistle it for you, so that hereafter you may distinguish it."

The judge whistled the melody and the prisoner listened intently. When his honor had finished the defendant exclaimed generously:

"Your honor, if the band had played the tune as you whistled it, I would not be here today—"

"Discharged," interrupted the well-pleased judge.

"But the band would," concluded the man in an undertone as he hastily retired from the court room.

The Gospel in the War Prison Camps

THE Gospel Committee for Work Among the War Prisoners is endeavoring to raise the sum of $125,000 for the purpose of supplying the prisoners in the War Prison Camps of Germany and Austria with Gospel literature. There are about 2,000,000 men in these camps, who are anxious to receive the Scriptures. The committee desires the generous aid of all those interested in the worthy cause of sending the Gospel message to the men who are so sorely in need of spiritual comfort. Contributions may be forwarded to the Christian Herald for transmission to the committee, who will acknowledge same direct.

JUST DAVID
By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.50.

The Christian Herald's Record Year of World-Wide Practical Benevolence

THE year now closing has surpassed all its predecessors in the number and widely distributed character of the benevolences of the Christian Herald and its readers. They have literally circled the globe! It is impossible to enumerate on a map of the proportions shown (opposite page) all the points to which these charities have extended. The lines on the map show the great procession of gifts that have gone out during the year to the Twelve Christian Herald Committees for the Relief of the War Widows and Orphans, namely: Paris, Rotterdam, Berlin, London, Vienna, Lodz, Brussels, Belgrade, Jerusalem, Constantinople, Beirut, Damascus (the three last-named for Armenian and Syrian Relief), besides the war prisoners' camps in Germany, where a great work of Gospel distribution is in progress among the Russian prisoners. The map also shows our missionary aid work in all four continents, the points reached in India, China, Japan, Korea, South America, Africa, Polynesia, and the Arctic being indicated. The points of contact in our own land, where various forms of work received help, cannot be indicated fully, owing to the smallness of the scale.

Acknowledgments of valuable aid rendered in the Christian Herald's relief work in behalf of the War Widows and Orphans are due to the State Department, Washington, D. C., for cable transmission of funds; also to the various foreign missionary boards for kindly interest and cooperation, and to our diplomatic representatives in London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Brussels, Constantinople and Jerusalem, who gave active personal assistance in the formation of Committees.

How to Do Most With Much or Little

WE now face a new year of endeavor, and on its very threshold are confronted by the undiminished need in Europe that for so long has wrung every heart. We have never found it necessary to do more than make a real need known to Christian Herald readers in order to enlist prompt and generous aid. We do not wish to be misunderstood as trying to define how giving shall be done when we offer the facilities of the Monthly Offering Clubs. But this plan is exactly in line with the present effort within practically all the leading denominations and within the Laymen's Missionary Movement, to bring the Christian Church up to the standard of systematic, proportionate giving. We know our readers wish to give to the right causes and in the most effective way. We leave it to each one always how much to give, how to give, when to give. We also wish to be as helpful in this direction as possible, and accordingly have devised these Monthly Offering Clubs solely to assist our readers. We invite you cordially and earnestly to enlist in one or another of the clubs. Remember that it is the amount only that you need to specify, as with each remittance you may designate how it shall be applied in charity and your wishes will be carried out. The clubs are as follows:

No. 1, for donors of fifty cents monthly. No. 2, for donors of one dollar monthly. No. 3, for donors of two dollars monthly. No. 4, for donors of three dollars monthly. No. 5, for donors of five dollars monthly. No. 6, for donors of ten dollars monthly. No. 7, for donors of twenty dollars monthly. No. 8, for donors of twenty-five dollars monthly. No. 9, for donors of fifty dollars monthly. No. 10, for donors of some amount monthly determined by circumstances each month.

The best way to address gifts is just to the Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York, and in the letter enclosing the remittance specify the use to which your money is to be put.

The Gambler

The Motorist who does not stop to put on Weed Tire Chains before driving over wet-slippery-skiddy streets gambles with his life and the lives of others.

Some men would gamble with anything from a counterfeit coin to life and property and all that they or others hold dear.

But at least they gamble for some stake which to them—if to no one else—seems worth the gamble. They do not risk their whole fortunes with only a few dollars to gain.

Why then, if time be precious, would they risk all the time allotted them here on earth, for the sake of a few moments of it now?

Yet, strange to say, this is just what some motorists do when they fail to stop to put on Tire Chains before driving over wet-slippery-skiddy streets. They gamble their automobiles, their limbs, their very lives, and the lives of others on the road—for no more than a little of their time to put on Weed Chains, the only dependable safeguard against skidding.
